1. This Treaty shall, upon its entry into force, supersede provisions of the following treaties between the United States of America and the Republic of China in so far as such provisions have not previously been terminated:

(a) Treaty of Peace, Amity and Commerce, signed at Wang Hea, July 3, 1844;

(b) Treaty of Peace, Amity and Commerce, signed at Tientsin, June 18, 1858;

(c) Treaty Establishing Trade Regulations and Tariff, signed at Shanghai, November 8, 1858;

(d) Treaty of Trade, Consuls and Emigration, signed at Washington, July 28, 1868;

(e) Immigration Treaty, signed at Peking, November 17, 1880;

(f) Treaty as to Commercial Intercourse and Judicial Procedure, signed at Peking, November 17, 1880;

(g) Treaty as to Commercial Relations, signed at Shanghai, October 8, 1903;

(h) Treaty Establishing Rates of Duty on Imports Into China, signed at Washington, October 20, 1920; and

(i) Treaty Regulating Tariff Relations, signed at Peiping, July 25, 1928.

2. Nothing in this Treaty shall be construed to limit or restrict in any way the rights, privileges and advantages accorded by the Treaty for the Relinquishment of Extraterritorial Rights in China and the Regulation of Related Matters and accompanying exchange of notes between the United States of America and the Republic of China signed at Washington on January 11, 1943.

ARTICLE XXX

1. This Treaty shall be ratified, and the ratifications thereof shall be exchanged at Nanking as soon as possible.

2. This Treaty shall enter into force on the day of the exchange of ratifications, and shall continue in force for a period of five years from that day.

3. Unless one year before the expiration of the aforesaid period of five years the Government of either High Contracting Party shall have given notice to the Government of the other High Contracting Party of intention to terminate this Treaty upon the expiration of the aforesaid period, the Treaty shall continue in force thereafter until one year from the date on which notice of intention to terminate it shall have been given by either High Contracting Party.

In witness whereof the respective Plenipotentiaries have signed this Treaty and have affixed hereunto their seals.

Done in duplicate, in the English and Chinese languages, both equally authentic, at Nanking, this fourth day of November, one thousand nine hundred forty-six, corresponding to the fourth day of the eleventh month of the thirty-fifth year of the Republic of China.

PROTOCOL

At the moment of signing this day the Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation between the United States of America and the Republic of China, the undersigned Plenipotentiaries have agreed upon the present Protocol which shall have the same validity as if provisions were inserted in the text of the Treaty to which it refers:

1. The provisions of Article II, paragraph 1, shall not be deemed to affect the right of either High Contracting Party to enforce statutes prescribing reasonable requirements concerning the registration of aliens within its territories, it being understood that identity cards which are now or may hereafter be required by the duly constituted authorities of such High Contracting Party shall be valid throughout the entire extent of the territories of that High Contracting Party, and that treatment accorded to nationals of such other High Contracting Party with respect to such requirements shall not be less favorable than that accorded to nationals of any third country.

2. (a) Without prejudice to rights given elsewhere in the Treaty, Article II, paragraph 2, refers only to rights and privileges to be enjoyed by nationals of either High Contracting Party as individuals, and shall not be construed to imply the right of such nationals to form corporations or associations on the same terms as nationals of the other High Contracting Party.

(b) The words "not forbidden by the laws and regulations enforced by the duly constituted authorities", as used in Article II, paragraph 2, shall be construed to mean such prohibitory laws and regulations as are applicable alike to nationals of the country and to nationals of the other High Contracting Party.

3. Rights in respect of "exploration for and exploitation of" mineral resources as referred to in Article V shall be construed to mean the rights to conduct mining enterprises and operations, as distinct from the ownership by nationals, corporations or associations of one High Contracting Party of interests in corporations or associations of the other High Contracting Party which are or may be engaged in mining operations in the territory of such other High Contracting Party.

4. The provisions of Article VIII, paragraph 1, shall not be construed to limit in any way rights or privileges accorded in other provisions of the Treaty with respect to real or other immovable property.

5. (a) The word "unauthorized", as used in Article IX, shall be construed to mean unauthorized by the owner of the industrial, literary or artistic property in any given case.

(b) The provision in the first sentence and in the second sentence of Article IX, that "effective remedy therefor shall be provided by civil action" shall not be construed to preclude remedies by other than civil action if such remedies are provided for by laws and regulations which are or may hereafter be enforced by the duly constituted authorities.

(c) So long as the laws and regulations of either High Contracting Party do not accord to its own nationals, corporations and associations protection against translations, the provisions of the third sentence of Article IX shall not be construed to obligate that High Contracting Party to accord to nationals, corporations or associations of the other High Contracting Party protection against translations.

6. Without prejudice to rights which are otherwise enjoyed or may hereafter be enjoyed, the word "grown" as used in Article XVIII, paragraph 2, shall not be construed to confer any right upon nationals, corporations or associations of either High Contracting Party to engage in agriculture within the territories of the other High Contracting Party.

7. The words "international financial transactions", as used in Article XIX, paragraph 3, shall be construed to include importation or exportation of paper money and governmental securities, it being understood that each High Contracting Party retains the right to adopt or enforce measures relating to such importation or exportation, provided the measures do not discriminate against nationals, corporations and associations of the other High Contracting Party in a manner contrary to the provisions of that paragraph.

8. The concluding sentence of paragraph 1 of Article XX shall not be construed to apply to postal services.

9. The words "gold or silver", as used in Article XXVI, paragraph 1, shall be construed to include bullion and coin.

10. Advantages which are or may hereafter be accorded by the United States of America, its territories or possessions or the Panama Canal Zone to one another or to the Republic of Cuba or to the Republic of the Philippines as stipulated in Article XXVI, paragraph 4, whenever extended to any other country, shall similarly be extended to the Republic of China.

REPORT OF GOVERNOR OF THE PANAMA CANAL

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Armed Services.

(For President's message, see today's proceedings of the House of Representatives on p. 2316.)

SUSPENSION OF DEPORTATION OF ALIENS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Attorney General, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report reciting the facts and pertinent provisions of law in the cases of 127 individuals whose deportation has been suspended for more than 6 months by the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization Service under the authority vested in the Attorney General, together with a statement of the reason for such suspension (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

INTERNATIONAL BILL OF RIGHTS

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to present for appropriate reference and to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the Philadelphia Archdiocesan Holy Name Union, on the 2d instant.

There being no objection, the resolution was received, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the United Nations Human Rights Commission is currently engaged in preparing the first draft of an international bill of rights; and

Whereas this is one of the most important single tasks in modern times since its formulation and implementation are basic prerequisites to a just and lasting peace; and

Whereas newspaper reports of the Commissions' meetings indicate the representative of one nation as claiming that only a small layer separates man from the animal and that the difference may simply be that man can think of someone else as well as of himself; and

Whereas other newspaper reports indicate that the representative of another nation claims that the bills of human rights presented for study are wrong because the emphasis is on the rights of individuals whereas the new trends in the world make it impossible to consider individuals except collectively; and

Whereas still other newspaper reports indicate that the representative of another nation urges the deletion of all the following concepts: "the right of life, of personal liberty; the prohibition of slavery and compulsory labor; the right to petition national governments and the United Nations; nonretroactivity of penal laws; right of property; prohibition of unlawful expropriation; freedom of movement and freedom to resist oppression"; and

Whereas these sentiments are in direct conflict with the natural law, the American Declaration of Independence, and the preamble of the United Nations Charter: Be it therefore

Resolved, That we, the delegates of the Philadelphia Archdiocesan Holy Name Union, regularly assembled at this March 2, 1947, quarterly meeting, hereby respectfully petition the Chief Executive of the United States, President Harry S. Truman, and the several Senators and congressional Representatives of the districts in which we live, to duly instruct the United States representative on the Human Rights Commission to insist that a bill of rights be drafted that takes complete cognizance of at least the following basic truths:

I. That the dignity of man, created in the image of God, obligates him to live in accordance with law imposed by God. Consequently, he is endowed as an individual and as a member of society with rights which are inalienable;

II. That the family is the natural and fundamental group unit of society and is endowed by the Creator with inalienable rights antecedent to all positive law. The family does not exist for the state, but on the other hand is not independent;

III. That political authority is entrusted by God to nations, which are endowed with rights and charged with the obligation of establishing justice, of promoting the general welfare of their citizens and of cooperating with other nations in furthering the universal welfare of mankind; and

IV. That the human family constitutes an organic unity or a world society and the states of the world have the right and duty to associate and to organize in international community for their common welfare.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED

The Secretary of the Senate reported that on today, March 20, 1947, he presented to the President of the United States the enrolled bill (S. 276) to provide for payment and settlement of mileage and other travel allowance accounts of military personnel.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting the nomination of James M. Alsup, of Honolulu, T. H., to be collector of internal revenue for the district of Hawaii, and withdrawing the nomination of Herbert E. Arnold, of Texas, to be collector of internal revenue for the second district of Texas, which nomination was referred to the Committee on Finance.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BUSHFIELD:

S. 949. A bill authorizing the issuance of a patent in fee to Joel Wade Tyndall;

S. 949. A bill to provide for the enforcement of the penal laws of the States on Indian reservations, and for other purposes; and

S. 950. A bill authorizing the issuance of a patent in fee to Mrs. Annie Eunice Arm Spotted Elk; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. WATKINS:

S. 951. A bill for the relief of Mrs. Yoshiye Hayashi Kurisaki; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. MURRAY:

S. 952. A bill authorizing an appropriation for the construction, extension, and improvement of a State tuberculosis sanatorium at Galen, Mont., to provide facilities for the treatment of tuberculous Indians in Montana; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. FULBRIGHT:

S. 953. A bill to amend the act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," as amended; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

By Mr. WILEY (by request):

S. 954. A bill for the relief of James H. Underwood; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(Mr. LANGER introduced Senate bill 955, for the relief of Toymus Ali, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. MAGNUSON:

S. 956. A bill to amend the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944, as amended, so as to extend the benefits of titles II, III, IV, and V of such act to members of the American Field Service; to the Committee on Finance.

S. 957. A bill for the relief of Col. William J. Kennard; and

S. 958. A bill to authorize the admission into the United States of persons of races indigenous to Siam, and to make them racially eligible for naturalization; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

TOYMUS ALI

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill for the relief of Toymus Ali, an Indian. I want particularly to call to the attention of the correspondents of the New York Daily News and the Times-Herald that I am introducing another bill for the relief of an Indian. This man has lived in the United States for nearly 20 years and he has had a clean record. All of a sudden the Department of Justice is trying to deport him. I am introducing this bill at the request of good American citizens who believe it is unjust that a man who has made a fine record all these years should, all of a sudden, be picked up by the nape of the neck and deported.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 955) for the relief of Toymus Ali, introduced by Mr. LANGER, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXTENSION OF CERTAIN POWERS OF THE PRESIDENT UNDER SECOND WAR POWERS ACT—AMENDMENT

Mr. YOUNG (for himself and Mr. LANGER) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to the bill (S. 931) to extend certain powers of the President under title III of the Second War Powers Act, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT NATIONAL PARK, N. DAK.—AMENDMENT

Mr. MORSE (for himself and Mr. CORDON) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to the bill (H. R. 731) to establish the Theodore Roosevelt National Park; to erect a monument in memory of Theodore Roosevelt in the village of Medora, N. Dak.; and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

SUGAR FOR MILK PROCESSORS

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, for the benefit of the Senate, I wish to make a brief announcement relative to sugar. Many Senators have called the Small Business Committee and have called my office, on behalf of plants that condense milk, in an effort to obtain sugar for processing milk.

The Office of Temporary Controls has informed me that effective April 1, 1947—assuming that the authority for sugar rationing will be continued by the Congress after its present expiration on March 31—milk processors will again be able to get sugar in quantities necessary to preserve their excess milk.

The Senate Small Business Committee has received many complaints from milk processors that they were unable to process their excess milk since the change in the rationing regulations, effective last November.

This present action of the rationing officials places the use of sugar in preserving milk on what is termed a "provisional allotment basis," as it had been prior to November 1, 1946. On that date the Office of Price Administration changed the regulations, and placed the use of sugar in preserving milk on an historical-use basis. In other words, the measure of how much sugar could be obtained by a bulk sweetened condensed milk processor was made dependent upon what had been used previously by a particular user, and not what his needs were.

Since November 1, 1946—and more particularly in the last month, when the flush milk season began—the Senate Small Business Committee has had countless complaints from every section of the United States that milk processors have been forced to pour milk down the sewer because of the lack of sugar with which to preserve it.

In addition to these complaints, the situation was further brought to the attention of the Senate Small Business Committee by the institution of the suit of the Moberly Milk Products Co., of Moberly, Mo., which sought to set aside the action of the Office of Price Administration in basing sugar usage for preservation of milk on a historical-use basis.

On March 12 an executive conference of the Senate Small Business Committee was held, at which various rationing officials of the Office of Price Administration were present. This situation was forcibly pointed out by the committee members present. At the meeting it was generally agreed that sugar should be made available to preserve milk.

The position of the Secretary of Agriculture, which he made clear in testimony before both the House and Senate Banking and Currency Committees, now considering the extension of sugar rationing, that milk would not be wasted because of lack of sugar, was brought to the attention of all those attending this conference.

In the light of the announcement made by the Office of Price Administration, which I understand had the full concurrence of the Department of Agriculture, I feel it to be my duty, as chairman of the Senate Small Business Committee, to report to the Senate that favorable outcome of our conference with the rationing officials, which not only means the saving of vast quantities of milk for human consumption, but also the favorable culmination of a strong protest by the committee on behalf of small business.

PROPOSED GREEK AND TURKISH LOANS—QUESTIONS AND STATEMENT BY SENATOR WILEY

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, yesterday, in accordance with the invitation of the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], I submitted to him for transmission to the State Department officials for answer a list of questions relating to the proposed Greek and Turkish loans.

I ask that there be printed in the RECORD at this point the text of my letter to the Senator from Michigan, and a statement which I have issued in connection with question 9 which makes inquiry concerning the setting up of a quid pro quo basis for United States foreign policy.

There being no objection, the letter and statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MARCH 19, 1947.

HON. ARTHUR VANDENBERG,
Chairman, Senate Foreign Relations Committee, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am presenting herewith a list of questions for submittal to the State Department in connection with the proposed Greek and Turkish loans.

1. In the opinion of the State Department, what is the basic justification for the steps that are contemplated under the Greek agreement? Are they in the opinion of the State Department basically preventative steps againt war, and if so, how so?

2. In view of the critical situation in the Near East, cannot pressure be brought to bear on the representatives of the various Governments in the United Nations to bring about the more immediate creation of an international police force under the UN's jurisdiction and the handling by the Council of situations like that presented in Greece?

3. Are there any other contemplated "surprise" expenditures which the Congress will be asked to authorize within the next year or so along the lines of the Greek and Turkish loans?

4. Has there been any understanding, oral or otherwise, with the Greeks that we would furnish other than advisory aid in military matters if it became necessary; that is, that we would actually use troops if circumstances seemed to require it?

5. Have we made any understanding, oral or otherwise, that we would lend economic, military or other assistance to any Near Eastern country other than Greece and Turkey, such as Palestine, Iraq, Trans-Jordan or nearby lands?

6. In view of the fact that Britain has stated that she could no longer maintain a military force in Greece, has she made similar statements in relation to any other near eastern territory?

7. Just what are the costs of British maintenance of military establishments in the Near Eastern countries, such as Iraq, Trans-Jordan, and Palestine?

8. If harmony could be worked out on a basis mutually satisfactory to the Arabs and the Jews in Palestine, would Britain then be willing to use some of the forces she is using in Palestine to station in Greece?

9. Is there any thought in the minds of our State Department that there should be a quid pro quo if the American taxpayer is to assume the burden of protecting not only American interests but British, French, and Dutch interests in the Near East? Is there any understanding that it's not a Santa Claus job entirely? In our loan to Turkey, are there not some vital materials that she could pay us with?

Sincerely yours,

ALEXANDER WILEY.

THE NEED FOR QUID PRO QUO IN UNITED STATES FOREIGN POLICY

I am determined that the answer to question No. 9 shall be that the United States shall, indeed, receive a quid pro quo for the untold billions of dollars which we will probably spend as we embark on the President's proposed program. The Lend-Lease Administration is right now terminating, after spending some $50,000,000,000, most of which admittedly was tremendously important in winning the war.

However, there is almost little or nothing to show for these fifty billions spent by the American taxpayer in the way of permanent economic concessions, strategic rights, or other advantages which any other nation in our position would have demanded and secured.

When the original lend-lease bill was being considered I stated that our aid program should be secured by foreign collateral, and that there should be a reciprocity in United States bargaining rather than the United States always paying a one-way roll.

There is no question of our "taking blood from stones now" wringing materials from so poverty-stricken a nation as Greece, but with other countries and indeed with Greece there is no reason why we cannot secure certain strategic air rights, sea rights, and further trade agreements such as any other nation in our position would. Our critics may scoff "Uncle Shylock" at this proposal, but it is time someone looked out for the American taxpayer. Our securing concessions is not a major goal of this program, of course.

The combating of communism and prevention of war would undoubtedly be our primary goals. Nevertheless there is no reason why we should not have subsidiary goals if we are to expend the resources of the American people.

NOMINATION OF DAVID E. LILIENTHAL AND BUSINESS OPERATIONS IN OAK RIDGE AREA

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a second letter from Mr. W. E. Badgett, of Knoxville, Tenn., relative to the Oak Ridge situation.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KNOXVILLE, TENN., March 19, 1947.

Hon. KENNETH D. MCKELLAR,
United States Senator,
Senate Office Building.

MY DEAR SENATOR MCKELLAR: I should like to pass on to you certain information which may be of interest and help to you in showing to the Senate on the floor the utter disqualification of Lilienthal to hold a position as Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission.

This information came to me through a client, Mr. Walter S. Crawford, who has been operating a business at Oak Ridge, Tenn., for some time. There are many others who are in the same status as Mr. Crawford.

When the Oak Ridge project was under the War Department it was the policy for the Government to lease certain buildings and the land connected therewith to private individuals for the carrying on of business which, in any other area of our great country, would be carried on by private enterprise. Recently, however, under Lilienthal's direction, the policy has been formulated, according to my information, that the Government will take over the functions and businesses previously operated on the Oak Ridge area and will operate them as a Government project. In my opinion such high-handedness, on the part of Mr. Lilienthal only goes to bear out that which you have been trying so valiantly and courageously to show to other members of the United States Senate—that Lilienthal's primary purpose in life is to destroy private enterprise and lead us into a Marxian System. The Atomic Energy Act contains no provision authorizing the Atomic Energy Commission to take over and operate, on the Oak Ridge area, functions which in ordinary life belong to private enterprise, and there is utterly no reason upon which Mr. Lilienthal may justify his action in thus destroying private enterprise on the area. His overt acts in this regard should stand as a warning signal to every member of the United States Senate of Mr. Lilienthal's true intentions with respect to the Tennessee Valley Area and his actions should he possibly be confirmed as Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission. Anyone may state in beautiful language his precepts of democracy, but, as you and I know, as attorneys, the best way to judge one is by his actions, and one's intent may certainly be ascertained by his actions. I think it would be well for the Senate of the United States, and those Members who would vote for Mr. Lilienthal's confirmation, to know of his overt actions as above related in thus destroying private enterprise. The information which I have is that it is the intention of the Atomic Energy Commission, effective June 1, 1947, to take over completely under Government ownership all businesses now operated by private enterprise on the area, and I know of my own personal knowledge and from Mr. Crawford that as contracts are expiring in the Oak Ridge area, the Government is taking over ownership and operation through a so-called "Oak Ridge Recreation and Welfare Association" as a front.

I hope that this information will be of some assistance to you in your efforts to "dethrone" Lilienthal, and I wish you all success in your efforts and hope that you will do all that you can to see to it that the Marxian theory of business enterprise does not prevail in the Oak Ridge area.

With kindest personal regards and best wishes, I am,

Sincerely yours,

W. E. Badgett,
BILL BADGETT.

EXEMPTION OF EMPLOYERS FROM LIABILITY FOR PORTAL-TO-PORTAL WAGES IN CERTAIN CASES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2157) to define and limit the jurisdiction of the courts to regulate actions arising under certain laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment, as amended.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, at this time the Senator from Rhode Island and the Senator from Nevada believe it well to place before the Senate their proposed amendment to the pending bill which is lying on the table. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the amendment, in the nature of a substitute for certain parts of the committee amendment, be considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is entitled to offer his amendment at the present time. Does he wish to have it read?

Mr. McCARRAN. I think it unnecessary to take up the time of the Senate in reading it, because copies of the proposed amendment are on the desks of all Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be printed in the RECORD, without reading.

The amendment proposed by Mr. McCARRAN for himself and Mr. McGRATH to the amendment reported by the committee is as follows:

Beginning with line 19, on page 10, strike out all down to and including line 2 on page 23 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"PART II

"EXISTING CLAIMS ELIMINATED

"SEC. 201. The second sentence of subsection 16 (b) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended to read as follows: 'Action to recover such liability may be maintained in any court of competent jurisdiction by any one or more employees for and in behalf of himself or themselves and other employees similarly situated; such action shall be deemed to have been commenced as to any individual claimant as of the date when such claimant is named in such action as a party thereto; and no employee shall be made or deemed a party plaintiff to any such action until his consent in writing to become such a party is filed in the court in which such action is brought: Provided, That no employee shall have any statutory right of recovery under this act based on any claim for unpaid minimum wages or unpaid overtime compensation or liquidated damages to the extent that such claim involves such activities of an employee engaged in prior to the effective date of this proviso as were not compensable working time under either (1) an express provision of a written or nonwritten contract in effect, at the time of such activity, between such employee, his agent, or collective-bargaining representative and his employer or (2) a custom or practice not inconsistent with any such contract in effect at the time of such activity at the establishment or other workplace where such activities were performed.'

"SEC. 202. Section 16 of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended by adding at the end thereof three new subsections, as follows:

"'STATUTE OF LIMITATION

"'(c) No action under this act for unpaid minimum wages, or unpaid overtime compensation, or liquidated damages, shall be brought or maintained unless commenced within three years after the cause of action accrued or, if such cause of action accrued prior to the date of enactment of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947 and such action is brought before the expiration of the period of 180 calendar days next following such date, then within the period of any applicable State statute of limitation: Provided, That this section shall not be construed to revive or extend any action which otherwise would have been barred by any statute of limitation applicable to such action.

"'SETTLEMENT OF CLAIMS

"'(d) Settlement, compromise, release, or satisfaction of any claim under this Act, for unpaid minimum wages, unpaid overtime compensation, or liquidated damages, accrued before the date of enactment of this subsection shall be a defense thereto and any other appropriate legal or equitable defense may be pleaded in defense of such claim.

"'CURATIVE PROVISIONS FOR VIOLATION RESULTING FROM COMPLIANCE WITH A REGULATION

"'(e) In any judgment hereafter rendered by any court of competent jurisdiction involving a claim under this Act, accrued prior to the date of enactment of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947, for unpaid minimum wages, unpaid overtime compensation, or liquidated damages, the employer shall not be held liable for such claim if he can satisfactorily show by competent evidence that his failure to pay minimum wages and overtime compensation under this act was occasioned by his adherence (prior to the time of the publication of a succeeding written interpretation or regulation) to a written interpretation or regulation of the Administrator even though such interpretation or regulation so adhered to was determined by judicial authority to be invalid.'

"SHORT TITLE

"SEC. 203. This act may be cited as the 'Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947.'

"Amend the title so as to read: 'An act to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended.'"

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Is the amendment which is now being offered by the Senator the same as the amendment that is printed?

Mr. McCARRAN. It is.

Mr. WHERRY. There are no changes?

Mr. McCARRAN. There are no changes.

Mr. President, at this time I also think it well, in view of the lengthy discussion which took place yesterday, during the course of which I occupied the floor for a considerable time, for me to draw to the attention of the Senate now a press release just issued by the Secretary of Labor, Mr. Schwellenbach, on the subject of the pending bill. I hope to have the attention of the able Senator from Missouri. If he has not seen this press release, he will find it of interest.

The Secretary of Labor says:

H. R. 2157, now pending in the Senate, concerning portal-to-portal suits under the Fair Labor Standards Act, is of much concern to everyone interested in fair labor standards for the working people of this country.

I would not feel it necessary to say anything concerning this legislation if the bill were limited to a method by which portal-to-portal claims for the past could be adjusted or settled. I believe it my duty, however, to point out, in the interest of all wage earners, that the proposed legislation goes far beyond a mere settlement of past portal-to-portal claims. As a matter of fact, the language and phraseology of H. R. 2157 are open to a construction that would vitally affect the future enforcement of the Fair Labor Standards Act. I do not believe the people of America are willing to take such a backward step from the sound social progress we have made in the past 15 years.

The statement issued by the Secretary of Labor continues:

I am afraid that in attempting to solve the portal-to-portal questions, the remedies proposed by H. R. 2157 would themselves create another series of problems and voluminous litigation. The result might be that additional legislation would be necessary to solve the problems created by H. R. 2157. This seems to me to be a clumsy method of settling the portal-to-portal problem. Furthermore, H. R. 2157 contains provisions relating not only to the Fair Labor Standards Act, but also the Walsh-Healey Act and the Davis-Bacon Act. Actions under the Walsh-Healey Act are brought by the Government and there never have been any employee suits for portal-to-portal activities under that act. The records of the Department of Labor do not disclose that there have been any employee suits under the Davis-Bacon Act which related in any way to portal-to-portal activities. If the purpose of the legislation is, as its sponsors claim, to solve the portal-to-portal question, I do not see why it is necessary to jeopardize the effectiveness of other statutes.

Under some of the terms of the bill, the millions of workers who are unorganized and without the benefit of union protection would be deprived in the future of many of the protective provisions of the present Fair Labor Standards Act. This is not necessary if we are concerned with solving only the present portal-to-portal question. As Secretary of Labor I do not want to see this great humanitarian statute crippled to such an extent that it cannot be properly enforced. I also do not believe that the Congress desires such a result.

Mr. President, there is now before the Senate for consideration the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. McGRATH] and myself. On yesterday I devoted my time to a discussion of the bill as reported by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate. On this occasion I propose to discuss as much in detail as I think it should be discussed, and as briefly as I think the cause justified, the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island and the Senator from Nevada, which has been printed and is on the desk of every Senator.

Mr. President, the amendment which I have just offered is the amendment referred to in the minority views on House bill 2157. I hope that the Senators who listened to the reading of the press release of the Secretary of Labor will recall what the Senator from Nevada said yesterday in his discussion of the committee bill. It is indeed startling to me to find that the Secretary of Labor has taken almost the identical theme on which I talked yesterday in part, and has made it his expression by way of a press release.

As the minority views point out, the amendment has four main purposes.

First, to provide a rule of law which will bar recovery upon the portal-to-portal claims already accrued, but which will not eliminate claims arising out of clear violations of the Fair Labor Standards Act which do not in any way involve portal-to-portal situations, so that deliberate and willful violators of the Fair Labor Standards Act will not escape liability and their employees will have the full protection of the law.

Second, to provide a simple and easy method of disposal of accrued portal-to-portal suits by permitting the parties to enter into compromise settlements.

Third, to establish a 3-year statute of limitation which will provide an equitable protection against accumulation of claims for large amounts of back wages.

Fourth, to provide uniform and adequate protection for employers who have adhered to written interpretations or regulations of the Administrator.

I intend, Mr. President, to analyze this proposed amendment most carefully and to draw certain comparisons between it and the language of the committee amendment. However, I shall not dwell at length upon such comparisons, but will rather confine myself, in the main, to discussion of the provisions of the amendment which I have offered on behalf of the Senator from Rhode Island and myself.

Senators will note that the text of this amendment is just long enough to cover three printed pages of the standard format of Senate bills, though it is offered as a substitute for more than 12 pages of legislative language in the committee bill. I hope it will not be argued here that because the committee bill is longer than the amendment which I have offered, it is, therefore, better.

The amendment which I have offered on behalf of the Senator from Rhode Island and myself contains three sections. The third section simply provides a short title and need not be considered here. Each of the other two sections proposes an amendment to the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938. The amendment does not in any way refer to or affect the Walsh-Healey Act or the Davis-Bacon Act.

The Senate will recall that in my discussion of yesterday I contended that it was not at all necessary to interfere with the Walsh-Healey Act and the Davis-Bacon Act.

Section 201 of the minority amendment, which begins with line 3 on page 1 of the printed amendment, would rewrite the second sentence of subsection 16 (b) of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

This entire subsection of the present law now reads as follows:

(b) Any employer who violates the provisions of section 6 or section 7 of this act shall be liable to the employee or employees affected in the amount of their unpaid minimum wages, or their unpaid overtime compensation, as the case may be, and in an additional equal amount as liquidated damages. Action to recover such liability may be maintained in any court of competent jurisdiction by any one or more employees for and in behalf of himself or themselves and other employees similarly situated, or such employee or employees may designate an agent or representative to maintain such action for and in behalf of all employees similarly situated. The court in such action shall, in addition to any judgment awarded to the plaintiff or plaintiffs, allow a reasonable attorney's fee to be paid by the defendant and costs of the action.

It is the second sentence of this paragraph which the minority amendment would rewrite, so as to read—and if Senators will turn to our minority amendment, which is on their desks, they may follow as I read:

Action to recover such liability may be maintained in any court of competent jurisdiction by any one or more employees for and in behalf of himself or themselves and other employees similarly situated; such action shall be deemed to have been commenced—

such action shall be deemed to have been commenced as to any individual claimant as of the date when such claimant is named in such action as a party thereto; and no employee shall be made or deemed a party plaintiff to any such action until his consent in writing to become such a party is filed in the court in which such action is brought: Provided, That no employee shall have any statutory right of recovery under this act based on any claim for unpaid minimum wages or unpaid overtime compensation or liquidated damages to the extent that such claim involves such activities of an employee engaged in prior to the effective date of this proviso as were not compensable working time under either (1) an express provision of a written or nonwritten contract in effect, at the time of such activity, between such employee, his agent, or collective-bargaining representative and his employer, or (2) a custom or practice not inconsistent with any such contract in effect at the time of such activity at the establishment or other workplace where such activities were performed.

Senators will find, upon comparing the language of the proposed amendment with the language of the act, that the first clause of the amendment, down to the semicolon in line 2 on page 2, is identical with the language of the sentence being amended, down to the comma midway of the sentence. The words "or such employee or employees may designate an agent or representative to maintain such action for and in behalf of all employees similarly situated," which appear in the present act, would be deleted from the act if the minority amendment should become law. This would have the effect of eliminating representative actions, while maintaining authority for collective actions. This is in accordance with good practice in the Federal courts. The proposed committee amendment would accomplish the same thing.

The minority amendment, beginning at the end of line 2 on page 2, provides:

Such action shall be deemed to have been commenced as to any individual claimant as of the date when such claimant is named in such action as a party thereto; and no employee shall be made or deemed a party plaintiff to any such action until his consent in writing to become such a party is filed in the court in which such action is brought.

This language is almost the same as the language of the committee bill, beginning in line 12 on page 18. The only important difference is that the committee bill uses the words "no employee shall be made a party plaintiff" whereas the minority substitute uses the language "no employee shall be made or deemed a party plaintiff."

The effect of this difference in language would be that under the amendment which I have offered on behalf of the Senator from Rhode Island and myself, no employee would be considered a party plaintiff to any of the portal-to-portal suits now pending unless and until his consent in writing to become such a party had been filed with the court in which the suit was pending. This would eliminate uncertainty as to the scope of these actions.

Now we come to the real meat in the coconut, which is contained in the proviso beginning in line 8 on page 2 of the amendment which I have offered. This proviso reads:

Provided, That no employee shall have any statutory right of recovery under this act based on any claim for unpaid minimum wages or unpaid overtime compensation or liquidated damages to the extent that such claim involves such activities of an employee engaged in prior to the effective date of this proviso as were not compensable working time under either (1) an express provision of a written or nonwritten contract in effect, at the time of such activity, between such employee, his agent, or collective-bargaining representative and his employer or (2) a custom or practice not inconsistent with any such contract in effect at the time of such activity at the establishment or other workplace where such activities were performed.

The language of this proviso is comparable to the language in part II of the committee bill, beginning in line 25 on page 10; but there are substantial differences which I shall attempt to explain.

For one thing, the language of my proposed amendment affects only the statutory rights of recovery granted to employees for claims based on unpaid minimum wages or unpaid overtime compensation or liquidated damages. It would not, for instance, affect a claim for quantum meruit; and it does not affect criminal liability. There is no need to legislate with respect to the criminal provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act, and thereby provide a possible loophole through which a willful and morally culpable violator might escape.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. YOUNG in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Are any of the suits which have been brought up to the present time based upon anything other than a statutory right?

Mr. McCARRAN. I am not familiar with any that are not based upon such a right.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. It was my impression that all of them had been based upon statutory rights.

Mr. McCARRAN. That is correct, so far as I know.

The Wage and Hour Administrator has adopted and published an enforcement policy under which no actions will be brought against any employers for alleged violations of section 6 or 7 of the Fair Labor Standard Act, under subsection (a) of section 16 of the act, occurring prior to March 15, of this year; and no employer is in any danger of criminal punishment in connection with any portal-to-portal claim, since it is unthinkable that a jury would convict for any such alleged violation.

Now I come to a very important point, Mr. President. Note the language of the proposed amendment, beginning in line 12 on page 2 as, follows:

To the extent that such claim involves such activities of an employee engaged in prior to the effective date of this proviso as were not compensable working time under either (1) an express provision of a written or nonwritten contract in effect, at the time of such activity, between such employee, his agent, or collective-bargaining representative and his employer or (2) a custom or practice not inconsistent with any such contract in effect at the time of such activity at the establishment or other workplace where such activities were performed.

The comparable language in the committee bill is as follows, beginning in line 5 on page 11:

For or on account of any activities of an employee engaged in prior to the date of enactment of this act, except those activities which were compensable by either—

(1) An express provision of a written or nonwritten contract in effect, at the time of such activity, between such employee, his agent, or collective-bargaining representative and his employer; or

(2) A custom or practice in effect, at the time of such activity, at the establishment or other place where such employee was employed, covering such activity, not inconsistent with a written or nonwritten contract, in effect at the time of such activity, between such employee, his agent, or collective-bargaining representative and his employer.

The language of the committee bill which I have just quoted is so broad that it would operate to outlaw all claims for activities not expressly made compensable by the provisions of a contract, or by a custom or practice. The effect of this language, therefore, is by no means limited to portal-to-portal suits, as such suits are generally comprehended. As I have pointed out earlier on this floor, the so-called saving clause in the committee bill, beginning with line 15 on page 12, is meaningless, since it uses an artificial definition of "portal-to-portal activities," namely, as provided in section 5 of the committee bill, on page 14:

Those activities which section 2 hereof provides shall not be a basis of liability or punishment—

And so forth. In other words, the definition is in terms of itself, and all that the so-called saving clause of the committee bill says is that the provisions of section 2 shall not be deemed to apply to any claims to which, by its own terms, it does not apply. As I said recently on the floor of the Senate, that is just legislative double-talk.

On the other hand, the language of the amendment I have offered is very carefully drawn so as to be applicable to any claim only with respect "to the extent that such claim involves such activities of an employee as were not compensable working time" under either an express provision of a written or nonwritten contract, or a custom or practice. The effect of this language is to reach all claims involving the question of what is compensable working time—and that includes all the claims based on what are commonly regarded as portal-to-portal activities—but not to touch claims which do not in any way involve the question of whether the nature of the activities engaged in was such as to be considered work. In the opinion of the five Senators who signed the minority report, this is as far as the Congress can go in narrowing down the applicability of such a provision, and still accomplish the important purpose of reaching all the portal-to-portal claims. The minority amendment does reach the portal-to-portal claims, and it reaches them and wipes them out just as effectively as the committee bill would wipe them out. But the minority amendment would not wipe out a claim involving no question of the nature of the activities engaged in. For instance, in the case of a piece-work contract which failed to specify any working hours, and which set the rate of compensation so low that an employee did not receive the hourly minimum specified by the act, the language of the minority amendment would not wipe out the claim; whereas, in my opinion, the language of the committee bill would wipe it out completely. Examples could be multiplied; but the principle is clear. The language of the amendment which I have offered goes only so far as is necessary to reach the portal-to-portal claims, and it goes no farther.

Section 202 of the proposed minority amendment would add three new subsections to section 16 of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

The first of these proposed new subsections would impose a 3-year statute of limitation. With respect to causes of action accrued prior to the date of enactment of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947, it would allow a grace period of 180 calendar days within which such action could be brought if not barred by an applicable State statute of limitation. It also contains a proviso, beginning with line 11 on page 3, that—

This section shall not be construed to revive or extend any action which otherwise would have been barred by any statute of limitation applicable to such action.

The effect of this proviso is to leave in effect applicable State statutes of limitation fixing periods less than the 3 years provided in this amendment. In other words, the language of the minority amendment does not propose to broaden or extend the rights of an employee in any State which now has a 1-year or 2-year statute of limitation. This seems to meet the point at which the proposed amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] is directed.

The language of the committee bill, in section 9, beginning in line 23 on page 18, fixes a 2-year statute of limitation; and the paragraph beginning in line 8 on page 19 allows a grace period of 120 days within which a claim accruing prior to the date of enactment of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947 may be commenced.

At first inspection, these comparable provisions of the proposed minority amendment and of the committee bill seem to differ only in the length of the statute of limitation fixed and in the length of the grace period allowed. However, closer inspection will show that the language of the committee bill would permit a wholly inequitable result, which I shall illustrate with an assumed case. Let us assume an employee, in a State which now has a 1-year statute of limitation, has a claim which accrued 13 months before the date of enactment of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947. His claim would be barred under his State statute, and therefore he would have no rights under the grace period provided for in the committee bill. However, after the lapse of 120 days after the date of enactment of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947, by which time his claim would be 17 months old, he would have a period of some 7 months within which he could come in and file that claim; because the creation of a Federal statute of limitation, without any such saving proviso as has been included in the minority amendment, would wipe out and supersede the State statute of limitation. In other words, lacking the protection of such a proviso, the language of the committee bill would operate to revive a claim which might have been barred under a 1-year State statute of limitation.

The second new subsection which the minority amendment would add to section 16 of the Fair Labor Standards Act is found on page 3 of the printed amendment, beginning with line 15. It refers to settlement of claims.

This subsection applies only to claims accrued before the enactment of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947. With respect to such claims—past claims—it permits settlement upon whatever terms may be agreed to between an employer and his employees. With respect to future claims, the minority amendment would leave the parties in the same position in which it finds them.

Perhaps the greatest evil in the portal-to-portal claims, as they are commonly regarded, is the element of surprise. Employers were suddenly faced with huge claims which they had not anticipated and which, in many cases, they could not reasonably have anticipated. With respect to such claims, an employer is entitled to have the right of settlement or compromise. With respect to future claims which may arise, there can be no such element of surprise; and so there is no need for providing a settlement feature which might be used to make the Fair Labor Standards Act ineffective for all time to come.

The third subsection which the minority amendment would add to section 16 of the Fair Labor Standards Act begins in line 23 on page 3 of the printed amendment. It provides that—

In any judgment hereafter rendered by any court of competent jurisdiction involving a claim under this act, accrued prior to the date of enactment of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947, for unpaid minimum wages, unpaid overtime compensation, or liquidated damages, the employer shall not be held liable for such claim if he can satisfactorily show by competent evidence that his failure to pay minimum wages and overtime compensation under this act was occasioned by his adherence (prior to the time of the publication of a succeeding written interpretation or regulation) to a written interpretation or regulation of the Administrator even though such interpretation or regulation so adhered to was determined by judicial authority to be invalid.

This language is the minority substitute for section 10 of the committee bill, which will be found on page 20 of that bill, beginning at line 16. The language of the minority amendment does not talk about good faith, which, as I have pointed out on this floor, is a term not defined in the committee bill, and therefore is open to very broad interpretation. The language of this particular portion of the minority amendment does, however, provide complete protection for any employer who adhered to a written interpretation or regulation of the Administrator. It does not permit an employer to rely on an interpretation or regulation to which he did not adhere, and to do so, as the committee bill does, would be clearly inequitable.

This language of the minority amendment does not have any effect with respect to violations which may occur subsequent to the date of enactment of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947. It is not intended to be a catch-all clause by which employers can escape liability under the Fair Labor Standards Act for clear and willful violations of that act. It is designed to provide uniform and adequate protection for employers who have followed the act and the regulations and written interpretations of the Administrator under the act.

In this regard the language of the minority amendment goes further than does that language of the committee bill in one important respect. As I pointed out on this floor yesterday and earlier today, neither the Gwynne bill nor the Senate committee substitute affords any protection to an employer with respect to alleged violations occurring between the middle of 1944, when the Supreme Court invalidated the October 1940 regulation of the Wage and Hour Administrator which defined area of production and December 1946, when the Administrator issued a succeeding regulation. The language of the amendment which I have offered on behalf of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. McGRATH] and myself does afford such protection. During that period of more than 2 years, there was no regulation interpreting or defining area of production. An employer who had been exempted from the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act under the order of October 1940 was, after the 1944 Court decision, on the horns of a dilemma. He could assume that he was no longer exempted, and, therefore, that he had to comply with all the provisions of the act, or he could assume that the new and succeeding regulation which the Wage and Hour Administrator ultimately would issue would still exempt him. An employer cannot be blamed if he crossed his fingers, said a prayer, and chose the latter presumption, because the Supreme Court had indicated its feeling that elimination of all exemptions would be clearly inequitable.

Many employers accordingly elected to continue to adhere to the 1940 regulation until such time as a succeeding regulation should be issued and made effective. Insofar as they did so adhere, those employers are entitled to protection. The Wage and Hour Administrator has recognized this by adopting and publishing the enforcement policy to which I referred earlier today. But this enforcement policy concerns only criminal liability. The Administrator cannot, by adoption of an enforcement policy, protect an employer against suits by his employees. Such protection can be given only by legislation; and, with respect to employers who did adhere to the 1940 regulation of the Administrator, or to written interpretations of the Administrator, such protection is given by the language of the proposed minority amendment.

To sum up, Mr. President, the amendment which I have offered has future effect only in two respects: It would fix a 3-year statute of limitation which would be applicable to all claims, both past and future, though not to the extent of increasing the period provided by any applicable shorter State statute; and it would eliminate, for the future, the filing of representative actions in behalf of employees, though preserving the right to file collective actions. In all other respects, this amendment would have no future effect. It will not emasculate or repeal the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, or deprive any employee, in the future, of his just and equal protection under that act. It will bar recovery upon the portal-to-portal claims already accrued, but will not eliminate claims arising out of violations of the Fair Labor Standards Act which do not involve portal-to-portal situations. It provides a simple and easy method of disposal of accrued portal-to-portal suits, by permitting the parties to enter into a compromise settlement; and it provides uniform and adequate protection for employers who adhered to written interpretations or regulations of the Administrator.

This, Mr. President, is as far as the Congress should go. If the laws written by previous Congresses for the protection of the working men and women of this country are to be materially altered or wiped from the statute books, the legislation to accomplish that purpose should originate, not in the Committee on the Judiciary, but in the Committee on Education and Labor, which properly has jurisdiction over labor legislation; and if protection against sweatshop conditions is to be withdrawn from the workers of this country, it should be done openly, and not in the devious and insidious method in which it would be done by the committee bill.

I therefore earnestly hope, Mr. President, that the minority amendment may be adopted.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have not had opportunity to study carefully the new committee bill or the minority views based upon it, or the amendment by way of substitute for certain parts of the bill offered by the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from Rhode Island. Personally I hesitate to take away any valid, meritorious rights enjoyed by anyone in this country, in order to relieve a situation which is admittedly fantastic in view of the number of the suits and the amount involved.

I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Nevada to a hypothetical situation; that is, it may be hypothetical, but it may be true in many cases.

Let us suppose that the 8-hour day is in effect in any given manufacturing institution, let us assume a machine shop, and that employees are required to go to work at 8 o'clock and work 8 hours during the day. But the employer in any given case requires the employees to be on the premises at 7:30 and spend half an hour sharpening the tools with which they are to work during the 8-hour period, tools belonging to the employer, or requires them to remain 30 minutes after the work day is over to sharpen or repair the tools for the 8-hour day which will come on the morrow. Let us assume that there is no contract between the employer and the employees which requires the employer to pay for that half hour, and let us suppose also that it has not been customary to pay for that half hour extra time. Let us suppose that the employer by some form of coercion, actual or constructive, inspires fear in an employee that if he does not obey his employer and put in the extra half hour of work, he will lose his job. What does the proposed legislation do in a case of that sort, and wherein does the proposed substitute differ from the committee bill in a case of that kind? I have a feeling that there are many cases like that in the United States.

Mr. McCARRAN. I think there are.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. Does the Senator wish to answer the question of the senior Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. COOPER. No; I want the Senator to yield so that I may propound a question. I should like to ask the senior Senator from Kentucky if his question is directed to activities which might have occurred before the enactment of the proposed legislation?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; my questions are related to activities which may have occurred prior to the enactment of the proposed legislation, as well as subsequent thereto.

Mr. COOPER. Very well.

Mr. BARKLEY. The scope of my question takes in both the period prior to and subsequent to the enactment of the proposed legislation.

Mr. McCARRAN. Then, I shall let the Senator who has charge of the main bill answer for the bill if he desires, but I should like to answer for the amendment.

Mr. COOPER. I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada if he can answer the question of the senior Senator from Kentucky, whether under the amendment which he has been discussing, which has been proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island and the Senator from Nevada, employees would receive compensation for the work referred to.

Mr. McCARRAN. The employees would have their right of action, if the work were embraced within custom or contract.

Mr. COOPER. Could an employee recover?

Mr. McCARRAN. Yes; I think he could recover.

Mr. COOPER. As I understand, the senior Senator from Kentucky gave an example of an activity which was not under contract, and asked the Senator from Nevada if the employee in that case could recover for that activity which was not under contract.

Mr. McCARRAN. If it was not under contract or custom, no.

Mr. COOPER. Then, under the Senator's amendment the employee could not recover?

Mr. McCARRAN. He could not recover?

Mr. BARKLEY. Then, if I understand the Senator, under neither the committee bill nor the proposed substitute amendment could an employee in the position I have indicated recover.

Mr. McCARRAN. Not unless he brought himself under contract, or established that it was customary to be paid for that kind of work.

Mr. BARKLEY. I should like to ask one other question in that regard. Do both measures, then, create a situation which requires every employee situated as I have indicated either to demand a contract in the future for the extra half hour of work, or run the risk of losing his job if he refuses to perform the extra half hour's work without compensation? Is that a fair statement of both measures?

Mr. McCARRAN. I think it is a fair statement.

Mr. BARKLEY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. I take it, then, that the answer the Senator has given to the senior Senator from Kentucky is that as to past claims there is no difference between the committee bill and the amendment which is proposed.

Mr. McCARRAN. I did not quite catch all the Senator's question.

Mr. COOPER. I understood the Senator from Nevada, in answering the question propounded by the senior Senator from Kentucky, to say that under the amendment of the Senator from Nevada there could be no recovery in the example the Senator from Kentucky gave.

Mr. McCARRAN. That is correct.

Mr. COOPER. Then I take it that it is admitted there is no difference as to past claims between the committee bill and the amendment proposed by the Senator.

Mr. McCARRAN. There is a great deal of difference because the committee bill does not attempt to deal with the situation brought forward by the senior Senator from Kentucky. The committee bill wipes out all right of action accruing by reason of portal-to-portal claims.

Mr. COOPER. Did not the Senator just say that under the amendment there could be no recovery in the case propounded by the senior Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. McCARRAN. Was it a portal-to-portal claim which was cited by the Senator from Kentucky? Certainly not.

Mr. COOPER. It was not a portal-to-portal claim.

Mr. McCARRAN. No; but the bill reported by the committee wipes out all portal-to-portal claims, and there are portal-to-portal claims which can have legitimate position.

Mr. COOPER. Is it true that the amendment offered by the Senator would wipe out all claims of the past except those based on contract or custom?

Mr. McCARRAN. That is true.

Mr. COOPER. Then the claim which was described by the Senator from Kentucky would be eliminated.

Mr. McCARRAN. Pardon me—except, as I tried to illustrate in this morning's presentation, that in some instances, such as in piecework, there might be a legitimate claim to enforce the minimum wage.

Mr. COOPER. Did the Senator say that if the piecework were not included in custom or practice it would be compensable under the amendment?

Mr. McCARRAN. It would be compensable under my amendment.

Mr. COOPER. I read from the amendment:

Provided, That no employee shall have any statutory right of recovery under this act based on any claim for unpaid minimum wages or unpaid overtime compensation or liquidated damages to the extent that such claim involves such activities of an employee engaged in prior to the effective date of this proviso as were not compensable working time under either (1) an express provision of a written or nonwritten contract in effect, at the time of such activity, between such employee, his agent, or collective-bargaining representative and his employer or (2) a custom or practice not inconsistent with any such contract in effect at the time of such activity.

I should like to have the Senator explain, in the light of that language, how the activity which he has just said would be compensable, could be compensable, if it is not under a contract or custom?

Mr. McCARRAN. Because the law was set up to maintain and establish a minimum wage.

Mr. COOPER. Under his amendment, the Senator is proposing an amendment to that law.

Mr. McCARRAN. Yes; but we do not destroy the spirit of the law, as does the Senator's bill.

Mr. COOPER. The amendment says in certain terms that no activity shall be compensable except by custom or practice.

Mr. McCARRAN. The spirit of the law known as the Fair Labor Standards Act is the maintenance of a minimum wage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] for himself and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. McGRATH].

Mr. WHITE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] on behalf of himself and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. McGRATH] to the committee amendment.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I have no prepared speech upon the pending bill, and in the short time I shall occupy the floor, I do not intend to discuss at any length the factual situation which has made this proposed legislation necessary, nor to argue the constitutional question raised by the provision in the committee bill, which retroactively invalidates portal-to-portal claims accruing before the date of the enactment of this measure. These questions have been discussed and presented exhaustively and ably and, I believe, unanswerably by the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL]. I should like to say that I believe he has rendered a notable service in providing for the Senate, for the people of the country, and later for the use perhaps of the Supreme Court, a factual analysis of the conditions which make the pending legislation necessary.

I might digress by saying that in the short time I have been here I have heard and read criticism directed toward the Congress for its alleged delay in the enactment of legislation. I am very happy that in the first task to which I was assigned after coming here, I have had the opportunity to be associated with a Senator who considers that his task is one of importance, and who has given to it the care and the deliberation which I believe such an important issue deserves.

In the short time I shall speak I shall have in mind three objectives: First, I should like to explain, as simply and clearly as may be possible, without legalistic words, the meaning and the provisions and the objectives of the commitee bill.

Second, I should like to challenge the argument which has been made by the proponents of the pending amendment, and particularly the argument which has been advanced by the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] that the bill strikes fundamentally at the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Third, I want to emphasize, the essential justice and equity and fairness of the committee bill.

In the exhaustive hearings that were held upon the bill numerous witnesses testified. Many of the witnesses who represented industry proposed and recommended changes which would substantially amend and modify the Fair Labor Standards Act. On the other other hand, many representatives of labor organizations said in effect that we should ignore the conditions which confront us because of this avalanche of portal-to-portal claims, and that we should take no action, even as to existing claims. I believe that all of them insisted that certainly nothing should be done as to the future, advancing the argument that if we did we might in fact emasculate the Fair Labor Standards Act.

The committee took the position that it did not represent labor as such, or industry as such, but that it was its duty to approach this question with an open mind and, after its findings, if it was determined that legislation was needed, then to recommend legislation which would be fair to both labor and industry and which would serve the public interest.

Mr. President, the senior Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND] approached the task with this viewpoint, and we had valuable help from the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], and many members of the committee. Notably among them I should like to mention the help we received from the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. MCGRATH]. He did not always agree with us. He did not always favor the objectives which we sought, but he did demonstrate his great interest in labor and his great interest in industry by working with us and by offering recommendations and suggestions in connection with framing the bill.

I am very sorry that during the weeks we devoted to the bill we did not have the benefit of the excellent advice which has been given to us in the last 2 days by the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN]. His advice would have been of great assistance in the preparation of the bill if it had been suggested during that time.

After a great deal of investigation and extensive hearings we reached two decisions: First, that approximately $6,000,000,000 of claims which have been filed constitute a threat against the economy of the Nation; that there was great danger that ultimately a portion of the claims would be shifted to the Treasury by war contractors by way of reimbursement and employers who will seek and receive tax adjustments. So we decided it was necessary as effectively and promptly as it could be done to invalidate retroactively portal-to-portal claims.

Our second decision was, that it was necessary to legislate as to the future. If we did not, the same conditions which prevail today would occur again, with all the resulting uncertainty, with all the resulting litigation. Further, it seemed to us that since the Wage and Hour Administrator and the courts have been developing their own criteria as to what activities should be deemed compensable or not compensable, the Congress which enacted the act had the power to establish certain standards and certain criteria which would assist the Wage and Hour Administrator and the courts in determining what activities are or are not compensable in the future.

So, addressing ourselves to the first task of efficiently and certainly invalidating existing portal-to-portal claims, we decided that the most efficient and most effective way was to provide that as to existing claims no activity would be compensable unless compensable by contract or by custom.

Since this debate started the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] have propounded questions to this effect: In providing as to existing and past claims that no activity shall be compensable except by custom or contract, does the committee bill go further than that? Does the committee bill strike down and make noncompensable some activities which have been compensable under the Fair Labor Standards Act prior to the Mount Clemens decision?

I shall be perfectly honest in answering that question in the Senate today. I say that that question must be answered in the affirmative, because when we provide that no activity shall be compensable except by custom or contract, it is certain that there have been activities performed in past years, within the statute of limitations, which were not under custom or contract, and yet were made compensable under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

I digress here to say that the amendment offered jointly by the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from Rhode Island would have exactly the same effect; it would also eliminate every activity except such as were made compensable by custom or contract. Any Senator who will read the amendment can reach no other conclusion.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DWORSHAK in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. ELLENDER. As I understand the distinguished Senator, there is no essential difference between the committee bill and the proposed substitute amendment with respect to past claims.

Mr. COOPER. There is no difference as to past claims. I shall demonstrate a little later, however, that the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island and the Senator from Nevada is much more drastic in its effect than is the bill proposed by the committee.

Mr. ELLENDER. That is, as to past claims.

Mr. COOPER. Yes. I shall try to give an example as to past claims.

Suppose that a certain woman was employed in a garment factory. By the terms of her contract she was to arrive at 7 o'clock and work until 5 o'clock. Under her contract she was to be paid only for the time during which she was actually performing work. It might be that during the day there were periods of inactivity during which she would be waiting for work, or for some reason would not be able to be engaged in work upon garments. The contract might provide that she should be paid only for actual productive work upon garments. Before the enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Act she could have received no compensation for the periods of inactivity. After the enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Act the Wage and Hour Administrator made certain interpretations, which were approved by the courts, which held, in effect, that during such period of inactivity, because an employee was required to be upon the premises of the employer, and because the employee's time during that period was utilized, even though there was no custom or contract, nevertheless the employer must pay for such time.

There were many interpretations extending the field, and I think most of them were equitable and fair. Finally, the Mount Clemens case further extended that doctrine, by holding that under certain circumstances other activities—even walking time—might be considered compensable.

Under the bill as reported by the committee the true portal-to-portal time, payment for which was first allowed in the Mount Clemens case, would not be compensable. Again, some of the activities which, prior to the enactment of this bill, had been held under interpretations of the Wage and Hour Administrator to be compensable, would also be excluded. Finally, the only claim which could be pursued to judgment under the committee bill would be a claim involving activities under custom or contract.

It may be said that such a provision appears to be very inequitable; and certainly upon the statement I have made it does appear to be inequitable. Yet we believe in practice that no great inequity as to the past has been done. I will state the reasons why we so believe.

First, as to members of organized labor, we must certainly believe that they have been informed of their rights; that they have kept abreast of the rulings of the Wage and Hour Administrator, and perhaps in nearly every instance incidental activities have been included in a contract arrived at by collective bargaining. Already such workers have been paid, so as to them the question becomes merely academic.

Second, there are employers of unorganized labor who have complied with the act, and have in good faith attempted to follow the interpretations of the Fair Labor Standards Act. We cannot assume that all employers are trying to evade the act. I believe that most employers are trying to follow the provisions of the act. In that event, they have already paid their employees, and certainly no inequity could be occasioned to them.

Finally, the only ones who might receive inequitable treatment under the terms of the committee bill would be an unascertained, unknown number of employees who have not been able to assert their rights.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. I am very grateful to the Senator for making this explanation. He has a vigorous and independent mind, and I have found his statement very beneficial. As I understand, both the committee bill and the pending amendment deal with portal-to-portal cases so far as the past is concerned.

Mr. COOPER. That is correct.

Mr. LODGE. So the substantial area of disagreement pertains to cases in the future. Is that, generally speaking, a correct statement?

Mr. COOPER. That is correct.

Mr. LODGE. Let us consider the case of a woman who works in a textile mill. She starts work at 8 o'clock in the morning. Let us say that at 10 o'clock in the morning there is a 2-hour delay because the supply of cotton has not arrived. Take that as a hypothetical case. Suppose that the employer seeks to take advantage of this employee by using those 2 hours when no work was done as an excuse to reduce the hourly rate. I think that is a practice which is resisted by the Wage and Hour Administration. Under the terms of the committee bill, so far as the future is concerned the power of the Wage and Hour Administration to interest itself and intervene in a case of that kind is not touched. Is that correct?

Mr. COOPER. Under the committee bill the power and right is preserved.

Mr. LODGE. And the only portions of the working day which are affected are the beginning and the end of the working day?

Mr. COOPER. That is correct.

Mr. LODGE. And any occurrence of that kind, which at the present time is contrary to the spirit and the letter of the Wages and Hours Act, would be unaffected by the proposed legislation?

Mr. COOPER. That is absolutely correct.

Mr. LODGE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. COOPER. To continue, as to the past we found that in any bill that could be written some inequities must result. It became a matter of balancing interests. We had determined that it was necessary, for the public good and the public interest, that the portal-to-portal claims be invalidated, certainly as to the past. Against that great public interest, an interest which may reach the Government itself as war contractors seek reimbursement from the Treasury or as tax adjustments were made against the Treasury, we had to balance possible inequities which might touch an unknown and undetermined number of people. Even then we must remember that such persons will always receive the amount which they anticipated they would receive under their contracts.

I should like also to call attention to the fact that in the past few years we have had high wages and good conditions of employment. So, for all practical purposes, we believe that no great inequity could be done as to past claims. Holding that belief, we found that the most effective and surest way to invalidate past claims was to provide that only claims which are compensable by custom or contract should be compensable.

The second decision we reached was to legislate as to the future. Before discussing the subject I should like to turn for a moment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island and the Senator from Nevada. First, let me say that the same objections which have been made in arguments against the committee bill can be addressed in every instance to the amendment proposed and now pending before the Senate.

In reading the minority views, I find this statement on page 1:

> During the long discussions held by the committee we made it clear that we did not oppose the position of the majority that portal-to-portal relief was necessary. However, we continually urged that a valid method be found to eliminate portal-to-portal claims which were the subject of the many hundred suits that are pending, while at the same time protecting the rights of employees on claims not based on portal-to-portal activities. We also made clear that we would not accept a bill which went beyond this immediate problem and lowered the standards of the Fair Labor Standards Act directly or indirectly.

I find these words on the second page:

> We believe that these standards cannot be set aside by contract or by custom or practice any more than the parties can employ child labor merely because they have been doing so in the past.

Again I find on page 6 the following:

> We believe that the statutory standards set out in the act should be strengthened rather than weakened, and we do not believe either prospectively or retrospectively that they should be superseded by either contracts or custom and practice which would provide for basic wage and hour standards less beneficial to the employee than those provided for in the act.

Reading those provisions, it would appear that those who proposed this amendment could not and cannot support any proposal which would limit compensation merely to custom or to practice. Yet on page 2 of the minority views I find these words:

> Under the scheme of our legislation, employees cannot recover on claims already accrued for portal-to-portal activities unless compensable by contract or custom or practice in effect at the time such activities were engaged in.

That statement is borne out by the amendment. I state again that as to existing claims there is absolutely no difference between the bill proposed by the committee and the amendment which is now pending.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. ELLENDER. With respect to claims, is it proposed to establish rules for the future which are different from those applying to the past?

Mr. COOPER. That is correct.

Mr. ELLENDER. Will the Senator kindly tell us, with reference to future claims, what additional rules, other than the statute of limitations, are provided which are not applicable in connection with past claims?

Mr. COOPER. I shall come to that point in a moment, if the Senator will bear with me.

Mr. ELLENDER. I am sorry I anticipated.

Mr. COOPER. I want to finish with the amendment. I do not want any Senator to have any doubt that there is no difference between the amendment now pending and the commitee bill as to existing claims.

Let me compare the wording as to existing claims. As to such claims, the committee bill provides:

> No employer shall be subject to any liability or punishment under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, the Walsh-Healey Act, or the Davis-Bacon Act on account of the failure of such employer to pay an employee minimum wages, or to pay an employee overtime compensation, for or on account of any activities of an employee engaged in prior to the date of enactment of this act, except those activities which were compensable by either—
> (1) an express provision of a written or nonwritten contract in effect, at the time of such activity, between such employee, his agent, or collective-bargaining representative and his employer; or
> (2) a custom or practice in effect, at the time of such activity, at the establishment or other place where such employee was employed, covering such activity, not inconsistent with a written or unwritten contract, in effect at the time of such activity, between such employee, his agent, or collective-bargaining representative and his employer.

It is plain, as I have stated before—I know it becomes repetitious—that there can be no recovery under our bill except in accordance with custom or contract.

I should like to read the amendment proposed:

> Provided, That no employee shall have any statutory right of recovery under this act based on any claim for unpaid minimum wages or unpaid overtime compensation or liquidated damages to the extent that such claim involves such activities of an employee engaged in prior to the effective date of this proviso as were not compensable working time under either (1) an express provision of a written or nonwritten contract in effect at the time of such activity, between such employee, his agent, or collective-bargaining representative and his employer or (2) a custom or practice not inconsistent with any such contract in effect at the time of such activity at the establishment or other work place where such activities were performed.

There is absolutely no difference between the provisions of the amendment and those of the committee bill. So I am at a loss to understand how the senior Senator from Nevada can argue that the amendment protects and preserves rights and claims which are not provided for by custom or contract.

Again I quote from the minority views:

> Under the scheme of our legislation employees cannot recover on claims already accrued for portal-to-portal activities unless compensable by contract or custom or practice in effect at the time such activities were engaged in.

Passing to other sections of the proposed amendment——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I have listened with a great deal of attention to the lucid argument which the Senator is making upon this particular point, but I desire to recall to his mind that he stated earlier in his discussion that in the bill there are some inequities which are altogether inseparable from the legislation. If I correctly understood him he told us that if the committee bill is enacted inequities will be imposed upon those who are employed. It seems to me that that is a very serious charge to make against the committee bill. I think it would be most helpful to those of us who are listening to the argument and who have not had the benefit of attendance upon committee hearings and have not had an opportunity to read the hearings, if the Senator would be good enough to describe to us the nature of the inequities which, as I understand him, he believes to be inseparable from the bill, so that we may know and the country may know what type of inequity we are proposing to inflict upon those who will be affected by this legislation.

Mr. COOPER. I shall be happy to do so. Was the Senator present a short time ago when I gave an example of an inequity which might arise either under the bill or under the amendment?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I believe I was not present when that example was given.

Mr. COOPER. I stated that it was the understanding and belief of the committee that probably no bill could be written affecting existing claims which would not impose some inequities. It becomes a matter of balancing interests or balancing the necessity of eliminating and invalidating this large volume of portal-to-portal claims which I believe everyone admits should, in the public interest, be invalidated against unknown and undetermined inequities which might result from the committee bill or from the pending amendment. As an example I stated that prior to the enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Act an employee in a garment factory had periods of inactivity during the day. She might have a contract which provided that she should receive compensation only for actual work performed during the day, and she would not be paid for the periods of inactivity. But after the enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Act the interpretation of the Wage and Hour Administrator was that she should receive such pay. Obviously, under our bill or under the amendment, if she had not previously received payment for such periods of inactivity, she would not be able to assert a claim for pay for similar periods, worked prior to the enactment of the pending bill, unless covered by contract or custom.

I went further and said that practically there would be very little inequity, for the reason that members of organized labor groups having kept abreast of these interpretations, will already have received payment for activities which are compensable under the act; and there are many employers of unorganized labor who have been complying with the act, so their employees have already secured payment for such periods. Therefore as to those two classes the question would be simply an academic one.

There is left an undetermined group of persons who have already received all the compensation they expected under their contracts, and who might not be able to secure added compensation under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Kentucky that the illustration he has now given, if I have understood him correctly, does not meet the question which is in my mind, because he referred specifically to a situation which might have existed prior to the passage of the Fair Labor Standards Act, if I understood correctly what he said.

Mr. COOPER. I used the first illustration in referring to the time before the passage of the Fair Labor Standards Act, and then I developed it and attempted to show what happened following the interpretations of the Wage and Hour Administrator.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. As I listened to the Senator earlier in the discussion, I received the impression that he was referring to the situation which has been brought about, not by the passage of the Fair Labor Standards Act but by the decision in the Mount Clemens Pottery Co. case. Is it not a fact that the entire issue of portal-to-portal pay has been brought to a crisis because of the original decision in the Mount Clemens Pottery Co. case and the interpretation which was placed upon the language of the Supreme Court?

Mr. COOPER. That is true. Of course, the Supreme Court extended its prior decisions, and opened up a field of compensation for activities which had not prior thereto been considered by anyone to be compensable.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Does the committee entertain the belief that the decision in the Mount Clemens Pottery Co. case had the effect of expanding the area in which portal-to-portal suits might be brought, and that that area has since been retracted, as it were, by the decision of Judge Picard, when he reexamined the facts in that case?

Mr. COOPER. I do not believe the decision of Judge Picard contracted the decision of the Supreme Court. Judge Picard made his findings only in that particular case; and, as has been so well said by Judge Jackson in a recent dissenting opinion, the Supreme Court by earlier decisions has "foreclosed every means by which any claim, however dubious, under this statute or under the Court's elastic and somewhat unpredictable interpretation of it can safely, or finally, be settled except by litigation to a final judgment."

As I understand the Supreme Court's decision, it will apply to all who fall under the Fair Labor Standards Act. The ruling of Judge Picard was only upon the facts in that particular case.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, as I read the committee bill, it seems to me to be explicit in its language that the Fair Labor Standards Act, the Walsh-Healey Act, and the Bacon-Davis Act, each, in some way or other established for employees statutory rights which now are to be taken away from them. Is that correct?

Mr. COOPER. No; I do not agree with the Senator in that conclusion.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am asking questions, I say to the Senator from Kentucky; I am not expressing opinions. So it is not a question of whether the Senator from Kentucky agrees with me, for I am asking questions.

Now let me ask the Senator to state whether he believes my statement of the legal effect of the language is correct. I read now from page 10, line 25:

(a) No employer shall be subject to any liability or punishment under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, the Walsh-Healey Act, or the Bacon-Davis Act on account of the failure of such employer to pay an employee minimum wages—

And so forth. Does not that mean that those who drafted that language were of the opinion that those three specific statutes gave rights which, in the judgment of the Judiciary Committee, should now be taken away?

Mr. COOPER. Not at all.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I shall be very happy to have the Senator from Kentucky explain that language.

Mr. COOPER. The Senator from Wyoming has read five or six lines of the section. If he will read all of section 2 (a), of part II, he will find that it applies only to claims which accrue prior to the enactment of this act, and which are based upon activities other than those made compensable by custom or contract. In no way does it change the Fair Labor Standards Act in its provisions for a minimum wage or a maximum workweek.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, if the Senator from Kentucky will indulge me further, let me say that I do not desire to be technical, but I am trying to understand the language.

Mr. COOPER. I shall be very happy to have the Senator from Wyoming ask further questions, of course.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Let us read the entire sentence, then:

(a) No employer shall be subject to any liability or punishment under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, the Walsh-Healey Act, or the Bacon-Davis Act on account of the failure of such employer to pay an employee minimum wages, or to pay an employee overtime compensation, for or on account of any activities of an employee engaged in prior to the date of enactment of this act, except those activities which were compensable by either—

Either paragraph (1) or paragraph (2), which follow.

To my mind, that language has only one meaning. It says, in common parlance, that the Fair Labor Standards Act, the Walsh-Healey Act, and the Bacon-Davis Act gave certain statutory rights to workers; and it also says that those rights, which may have accrued under those particular laws prior to the date on which this bill becomes law, are to be withdrawn unless they fall into categories (1) and (2), as set forth in the language going from line 8 to line 18, inclusive, on page 11. Am I correct about that?

Mr. COOPER. There is absolutely no question about the answer to the question, which is that if the activity for which the worker claims compensation was not compensable under a custom or contract, and if such activity occurred prior to the date of enactment of this act, the employee cannot recover minimum wages, cannot recover overtime compensation, cannot recover liquidated damages. That is the purpose of this bill.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is correct.

Mr. COOPER. Its purpose is to strike down the portal-to-portal claims.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. So the purpose of the bill is to withdraw certain statutory rights which were given under those three particular acts of Congress, unless the action accrues after the date of enactment of this measure; is that correct?

Mr. COOPER. Exactly—as to those activities which are described in section 2 (a).

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Then does that come within the description which the Senator originally gave of inequities which would be visited upon workers affected by the law?

Mr. COOPER. I was answering in this way——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator will observe that I am coming back to the original question. The Senator from Kentucky answered it by giving an example of a situation which existed prior to the passage of the Fair Labor Standards Act. Can the Senator give us an example of an inequity which will flow from the committee bill on account of a cause of action which has arisen since the passage of the Fair Labor Standards Act or either of the other two acts which have been mentioned?

Mr. COOPER. I would say to the Senator that the example I gave I think is applicable either before or after the enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Act. The committee reaches the conclusion—and that is the reason for the introduction of the bill—that no inequity is done as to certain types of activity made compensable after the Mount Clemens decision.

Mr. President, I should now like to pass to the provisions of the bill as to future claims. I have stated before that after the conclusion of the hearings, the committee made a second decision, namely, that it should recommend legislation, addressing itself to the future, the purpose of which would be to prevent a recurrence of the conditions which now confront the country; and, second, to establish for the first time some standards or criteria which would assist the Wage and Hour Administrator and the courts in determining what activities should be compensable under the act.

It might be assumed from the debates and the arguments which have been heard that every type of activity which has hitherto been compensable is spelled out in the Fair Labor Standards Act, and that any change proposed would foster an inequity. As a matter of fact, at no place in the Fair Labor Standards Act is any mention made as to what activities shall or shall not be compensable, and in no place is there found a definition of "work." The only place where any reference to "work" is found is in section 7 (a) referring to the length of the workweek. In section 3 (g) there is the provision that " 'Employ' includes to suffer or permit to work."

In section 3 (j), in the definition of the word "produce", it is stated that " 'produced' means produced, manufactured, mined, handled, or in any other manner worked on in any State; and for the purposes of this act an employee shall be deemed to have been engaged in the production of goods if such employee was employed in producing, manufacturing, mining, handling, transporting, or in any other manner working on such goods, or in any process or occupation necessary to the production thereof, in any State."

I state again that with the exception of these references there is nothing in the act which defines or attempts to define what activity shall be compensable, and there is no definition of "work" in the act.

It might be argued, and there is very good authority for arguing, that the Congress intended in the enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Act that "work" should have its ordinary or colloquial meaning. That argument was made by Mr. Justice Roberts in the case of Tennessee Coal, Iron and Railroad Co. et al. against Mucode Local 123 et al. In the recent Mount Clemens case, in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Burton, we find again the same argument. He said:

> "Workweek" is a simple term used by Congress in accordance with the common understanding of it. For this Court to include in it items that have been customarily and generally absorbed in the rate of pay but excluded from measured working time is not justified in the absence of affirmative legislative action.

So, I say there is strong argument that Congress in the enactment of the act intended that "work" should bear its traditional, its ordinary, and its colloquial meaning.

However, the Wage and Hour Administrator, after the enactment of the act, began to issue interpretative bulletins in which he refused to accept the colloquial and ordinary definition of "work," but developed his own criteria and his own standards, and held, in fact, that employers must pay employees for activities even though they were not covered by custom or by contract.

The action of the Wage and Hour Administrator was upheld from time to time by the courts in numerous decisions, defining standards by which it was determined whether or not any specific activity was actually work and should be compensable. In the case of Jewell Ridge Coal Corp. against Local No. 6167, United Mine Workers of America, and others, decided on May 7, 1945, in the Supreme Court, there are set forth certain standards by which it may be determined whether an activity is compensable. Those standards are, first, physical or mental exertion, whether burdensome or not: second, exertion controlled or required by the employer; third, exertion pursued necessarily and primarily for the benefit of the employer and his business.

Upon the basis of these standards the courts in many decisions held that although a contract may not provide that certain activities shall be compensable, and even in the absence of a contract or in the teeth of a contract, if the court determines that activities fall under those standards, then the employer will be required to pay the employee.

Mr. President, in answer to the arguments which have been made that there has been an effort on the part of the committee or upon the part of someone to destroy and emasculate the Fair Labor Standards Act, I should like to say that it has been the desire of the committee during the hearings, and during its labors, to perpetuate all of the gains of the Fair Labor Standards Act, and reach only the new so-called portal-to-portal activities. That has been the objective and purpose of the committee. We believe that our provisions as to the future attain those objectives. I do not know how other members of the Committee on the Judiciary may feel about this matter. I think I know how the distinguished Senator from Missouri feels, because we have talked many times about it: I can say for myself that I am happy that the Wage and Hour Administrator and the courts departed from the ordinary and colloquial meaning of the word "work," and adopted a broader and more liberal view. In doing so they have expanded the rights of workers and provided better living conditions for them.

However, we have believed that in the latest extension, in the Mount Clemens case, the courts went too far, and that, under the decision, following these standards, activities were held to be compensable when logically and equitably there should be no compensation activities.

Looking to the future, a section has been prepared which we believe for the first time embodies a declaration by the Congress upholding the decisions which have been reached by the Wage and Hour Administrator and the courts as to certain activities prior to the Mount Clemens decision.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a very simple question?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. Am I correct in understanding that one primary difference between the committee bill and the proposed amendment is that the committee bill outlaws portal-to-portal claims, not only up to the present, but arising in the future, as well, whereas the McCarran amendment simply outlaws them to the present time? Is that a correct understanding of the situation?

Mr. COOPER. There is no distinction between the committee bill and the amendment proposed as to existing or past claims.

Mr. AIKEN. But the committee bill outlaws them in the future, as well as in the past?

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. AIKEN. The McCarran amendment does not do so; is that a correct understanding?

Mr. COOPER. That is correct.

Mr. AIKEN. That is as I have been informed. I wanted to get it clear.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. ELLENDER. I share the view of the distinguished Senator from Kentucky that, as to past claims, there is no difference between the committee amendment and the McCarran amendment; but what I am interested in having the distinguished Senator point out, if he will, is the difference in the rules and regulations governing future claims, and, if there are any differences, why they are necessary.

Mr. COOPER. I shall attempt to do that now. Let me say that if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from Rhode Island is adopted, there will be absolutely no legislation as to the future, and the rule enunciated in the Mount Clemens case will still be the law of the land. I want the Senate to understand that clearly. Unless legislation is enacted as to the future, the rule laid down in the Mount Clemens case will hold, it will be the law of the land, and the same conditions which now prevail will be extended into the future.

Mr. ELLENDER. Why could not the ruling in the Mount Clemens case be made applicable throughout, and not merely made applicable to past claims?

Mr. COOPER. It could be.

Mr. ELLENDER. The Senator says that corrections must be made in order to deal with future claims. I do not follow the Senator on that point.

Mr. COOPER. If I may I should like to conclude as to the future claims. It became a question of deciding what legislation should be proposed as to future claims. A reading of the bill passed by the House will show that it provides that, as to the future, no activities shall be compensable except by custom or contract, exactly as we have provided as to past claims. We did not adopt the House rule as to the future, because, if adopted, it would in our opinion destroy the advantages which have been given to labor by interpretations of the Fair Labor Standards Act. For that reason a different type of legislation is proposed here as to the future. I shall explain that proposal.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. Does this mean that if the proposed amendment to the committee bill, which outlaws past claims with no reference made to the future, should be adopted, then some employers who had not been paying portal-to-portal pay would find themselves in a position of really paying an increased wage scale without the necessity of changing a contract, or, if they wanted to pay the same scale they had been paying, they would then have to negotiate a new contract at a lower rate, which would take into consideration portal-to-portal time? Is that a correct understanding of the results of the enactment, or failure to enact, certain legislation?

Mr. COOPER. That is correct. The committee decided, first, that we should make noncompensable, walking, riding, or traveling to and from the actual place of performance of the principal activities which such employee is employed to perform. Then, clearly and definitely, as to the future, an employee cannot receive compensation for any walking, riding, or traveling time to the actual place of performance where he begins his actual activities.

Mr. ELLENDER. That is, unless there is a written contract to that effect?

Mr. COOPER. Yes; with one exception, that the employer and the employee may agree by contract that the employee shall receive compensation for such walking, traveling, or riding.

Mr. ELLENDER. In that respect, there is then no difference from the rules established as to past claims. If there had been such a contract, or if it had been the custom, it would be outlawed; and, for the future, there would have to be a contract or a custom?

Mr. COOPER. I think there is quite a decided difference. As the law now stands, walking, riding, and traveling could be compensable. We say that they are not compensable, but we do not deprive the employer and employee of the right to make them compensable by contract. There is quite a difference.

Mr. ELLENDER. They would be outlawed as to past claims, in the absence of a written contract or a custom?

Mr. COOPER. Yes. I have explained that the reason for that is that in order definitely and surely to relieve against past claims, a stricter rule was adopted.

Mr. ELLENDER. Was not virtually the same rule adopted as to future claims?

Mr. COOPER. I think not. If the Senator will permit me to proceed, I think I can explain. Walking, riding, or traveling time to the place where the principal activities are performed has been eliminated as a principal activity.

Mr. ELLENDER. And that is true, even though it be agreed upon by contract?

Mr. COOPER. No.

Mr. ELLENDER. That is what I am saying—there is no difference.

Mr. COOPER. I have already given the Senator the exception. For the period from the beginning of the time of the employee's principal activity, until that principal activity is ended, we do not legislate at all. That area is still under the Wage and Hour Administrator. The rules which have already been developed by the Wage and Hour Administrator and the decisions of the courts still apply to that interval between the commencement of the employee's principal activity and the end thereof. I think in doing that we have demonstrated that we want to preserve to the worker the rights which he has attained since the enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Act. I will give an illustration. I gave an illustration a little while ago. If during the scheduled workday there is a period of inactivity, and even if there is a custom or contract which denies compensation for that period of inactivity, yet under our bill, if the Wage and Hour Administrator ruled that the employee should be so compensated and was sustained by the courts, the employer could and would pay for the period of inactivity.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. PEPPER. It may be that I owe the Senator an apology for asking this question, because he may have made a statement concerning it while I was not present in the Chamber, but has the able Senator made any distinction between the provisions of the committee bill in respect to existing claims and the provisions of the McCarran-McGrath amendment with respect to existing claims, and if so, what is the distinction, if I may ask?

Mr. COOPER. I spent some time on that point, but I will answer the question by saying that I am sure if the Senator from Florida will read the two measures be will, I believe, concur that there is absolutely no difference between the committee bill and the pending amendment with respect to existing claims.

Mr. PEPPER. So the Senator is of the opinion that the two measures in that respect are identical in their provisions?

Mr. COOPER. Yes; I am.

Mr. PEPPER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. COOPER. Reverting again to future claims, I repeat that as to the period which we might call the scheduled workday, from the commencement of the principal activity until it is completed, the committee bill does not legislate. Every right that a worker has secured under the Fair Labor Standards Act up to the Mount Clemens decision is preserved to him. I believe that the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island would agree with the statement I have just made.

There is one other area in which it could be argued that the committee bill might deprive a worker of some right which he has earned or which has been accorded to him under the Fair Labor Standards Act, and that is in a determination or definition of the words "principal activity." I will give an example. Before the enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Act an employee might have worked upon a lathe under a contract, and his contract may have provided that his pay should commence at a scheduled hour, say at 7 o'clock when the lathe began to run, and he began to apply his energy to a casting or to a block upon the lathe. After the enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Act, by interpretations of the Wage and Hour Administrator, it was held that certain preparatory activities such as sharpening the tools, oiling the machinery, preparing his machinery for work, were so closely related to his productive activity that the employer must compensate the employee for it. We believe that in the use of the words "principal activity" we have preserved to the employee the rights and the benefits and the privileges which have been given to him under the Fair Labor Standards Act, because it is our opinion that those activities which are so closely related and are an integral part of the principal activity, indispensable to its performance, must be included in the concept of principal activity. And to make our position clear we have given examples in the report.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. McGRATH. I think that at this point we might very definitely make contribution to the legislative history of what we are doing here. Am I correct in understanding the Senator to say that what the majority of the committee proposes is that any activity of a worker shall be considered a part of his principal activity if the doing of that act is indispensable to the performance of the rest of his day's work?

Mr. COOPER. I can read the language used in the report, and I think that language should be used in this connection, because the words and phrases it employs were adopted by the committee. On page 48 of the report, in the definition of "principal activity," we find these words:

> It will be observed that the particular time at which the employee commences his principal activity or activities and ceases his principal activity or activities marked the beginning and the end of his workday. The term "principal activity or activities" includes all activities which are an integral part thereof as illustrated by the following examples:

1. In connection with the operation of a lathe an employee will frequently at the commencement of his workday oil, grease, or clean his machine, or install a new cutting tool. Such activities are an integral part of the principal activity, and are included within such term.

2. In the case of a garment worker in a textile mill, who is required to report 30 minutes before other employees report to commence their principal activities, and who during such 30 minutes distributes clothing or parts of clothing at the workbenches of other employees and gets machines in readiness for operation by other employees, such activities are among the principal activities of such employee.

We believe that our bill provides that the employee must receive compensation for such activities.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. McGRATH. Is there any significance to the use of the words "thirty minutes"? Suppose the same activities which are described in the report require only 15 minutes. Would they be regarded as part of the compensable workday, or must the particular activity of distributing clothing, and so forth, as mentioned in example 2, in order to be compensable, require 30 minutes?

Mr. COOPER. No; there was no definite purpose in using the words "thirty minutes" instead of 15 or 10 minutes or 5 minutes or any other number of minutes.

Mr. McGRATH. Then we can clear that point up by reiterating that what the committee means is that any amount of time spent in the performance of the type of activity expressed in examples 1 and 2 is to be hereafter regarded as compensable time.

Mr. COOPER. I should certainly say so, as a part of the principal activity.

Mr. McGRATH. There are innumerable instances of operations which have to be performed that are not covered in these two particular examples. I think of one at the moment. In certain of our chemical plants workers are required to put on special clothing and to take off their clothing at the end of the workday, and in some of the plants they are required to take shower baths before they leave. Does the Senator regard such activity as that as coming within the compensable workday?

Mr. COOPER. I am very happy that the Senator has asked the question, because I believe it gives the opportunity of drawing a fine distinction between the type of activity which we consider compensable and the type which should not be compensable. In accordance with our intention as to the definition of "principal activity," if the employee could not perform his activity without putting on certain clothes, then the time used in changing into those clothes would be compensable as part of his principal activity. On the other hand, if changing clothes were merely a convenience to the employee and not directly related to the specific work, it would not be considered a part of his principal activity, and it follows that such time would not be compensable.

Mr. McGRATH. Let me ask the Senator to apply his understanding to the following hypothetical case: A worker who is paid at piecework rates is required by his employer to report at the place of employment at a particular hour, and he does so. However, in the course of a given day he does not receive the work along the line of production, either because some of the operations preceding him have broken down or for some other reason. Does the Senator regard the compensable workday of that type of worker as beginning at the time he reports to the place where he would normally perform his activity, whether he actually performs any work or not, so long as the nonperformance is for a cause beyond his control?

Mr. COOPER. We regard the commencement of his workday as the time stated in the bill, at the time he commences his principal activity.

Mr. McGRATH. Does he commence his activity when he arrives at his machine by order and under the direction of the employer and is ready to go to work, or does he begin that activity at the time the goods upon which he can work reach him? I am speaking about a situation over which the employee has no control whatsoever. He is there and ready to work, but for some reason—whether the fault of the employer or some other cause—there is no work for him to do. What is his situation? Must he sit all day and not have any compensable working hours in that day?

Mr. COOPER. It is our opinion that when the employee reports at the actual place of performance of his principal activity, his workday commences, and the time should be compensated for.

Mr. McGRATH. So his arrival is what governs, rather than the beginning of his activity.

Mr. COOPER. If arrival is required by the employer at a certain specific time.

Mr. McGRATH. While I am on my feet, if the Senator will yield further, let me say that I have grave concern about the language of part III, under the heading "Future claims," with which we are, of course, most concerned. In this language I know that all walking, riding, or traveling time to and from the actual place of performance of the principal activity is made noncompensable unless it is made compensable by an express provision of a written or unwritten contract in effect at the time of such activity, or by a custom or practice in effect at the time at the particular establishment. I am sure the Senator is aware of the fact that for many years a great many contracts have contained written provisions for travel time when the travel time is on the employer's premises. I should like to have the Senator express his view on the question as to whether or not, by the use of this language, the Congress is saying to employers throughout the country, "Unless you put travel time in your contracts, you will not have to pay for it." In other words, are we not saying to employers who now have such a provision in their contracts, "The next time you negotiate a contract you may well say that you do not care to put that provision in it, because the law of the land sanctions its omission; and if such a provision is not in the contract, that time is not consdered compensable"? To that extent are we not opening up anew a great field of labor trouble and strife which has long since been settled? I should like to have the Senator's views on that subject.

Mr. COOPER. There is no doubt that section 7A, subsection (a), makes it necessary that a contract be entered into between the employer and the employee before walking, riding, or traveling time can be considered compensable.

Again I say that it is a question of balancing the interest which the Senator says would produce strife and conflict against the possibilities of disputes which must inevitably arise if the decision in the Mount Clemens case as to travel time is maintained as a part of the law and if a determination must be made in the case of every employer and every plant as to whether or not the individual worker shall receive compensation for travel time.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. McGRATH. As I understand the answer of the Senator, he admits that by the use of this language there is the possibility of labor strife in the field of travel upon the premises of the employer, and in those fields of operation in which strife has long since been settled by labor contracts.

Mr. COOPER. With all due respect to the Senator, I did not admit it. I said that it was a question of accepting the statement made by the distinguished Senator as true, and balancing that possibility against the inevitable fact that strife will continue if travel time must be established for every individual in every plant and every time the physical facilities of the plant are changed, or the employee's workplace is changed. Furthermore, I do not think the danger is so great as the Senator implies, because it will be remembered that these practices have developed over the years and have been embodied in the terms of contracts by collective bargaining, and have been established. It is reasonable to believe that in those instances they will be preserved. I invite the attention of the Senator to the fact that, according to reports of the United States Department of Labor, the coal-mining industry is organized by union membership to the extent of 95 percent; the iron-mining industry 90 percent; and the mining of nonferrous metals, 80 percent. It is my opinion that in those organized fields provision will be made in contracts for compensation for the time referred to.

Mr. McGRATH. It is true that in a great many of the existing mining contracts provision is made for portal-to-portal pay. But is it not likewise true that that is one of the principal items in controversy between the owners and the miners? Is it not true that that is one of the reasons why the mines have so long remained in the hands of the Government? If I am correct in that assumption, I am led to believe that the Congress proposes to say to the mine owners that it does not consider it necessary for them to pay for walking, riding, and travel time unless they choose to put such a provision in their contracts. By the use of this language are we not almost inviting them to resist putting such a provision in their contracts, even though it is there at the present time? I am speaking of the time when new contracts will be negotiated.

Mr. COOPER. I remember that yesterday in the able argument of the Senator he used the words "the realities of the industrial world." I believe I am correct as to his use of that phrase. If he will apply that phrase to his question, I think he will have no doubt that in contracts entered into between the labor and mine owners travel time will be provided for.

Mr. President, I wish to close——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The question is suggested by the colloquy between the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Rhode Island. I will read from the committee bill. The Senator will recall that the Committee on the Judiciary reported a bill and then asked unanimous consent to have the bill recommitted because it was not satisfactory?

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. And it now has reported a new bill. The action of withdrawing the bill undoubtedly was due to the fact that the members of the committee and those who drafted the bill were not satisfied with their first handiwork, and I am wondering whether they will be any better satisfied with their new handiwork, particularly when I read section 7 (a) which was the subject of the discussion between the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Rhode Island. My question to the Senator is this: Does not the language amount to practically a specific statement by the Congress that hereafter no minimum wage shall be paid and no overtime shall be paid for "walking, riding, or traveling to and from the actual place of performance of the principal activity or activities which such employee is employed to perform, and (b) activities which were preliminary to or postliminary to said principal activity or activities," unless hereafter an express provision of a written or nonwritten contract is entered into covering that situation.

Is not that correct?

Mr. COOPER. I think the Senator has accurately read the provision of the bill.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Will the Senator not agree with me that if the bill becomes a law it is notice by the Congress of the United States to every employer, "If you do not have a written or unwritten contract which requires the payment of minimum wages or of overtime for those activities, you do not need to make any"?

Mr. COOPER. Of course, I shall again apply the answer which I gave to the question of the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island. He said yesterday in his very able argument that those matters had to be considered in the light of realities.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. In the light of realities, yes. But it seems to me——

Mr. COOPER. I should like to remind the Senator that on the other side of the table there would be representatives of labor who would certainly make their position known; and I can not assume that the employer could, of his own volition, determine the terms of the contract. I do not believe the Senator will differ with me on that proposition.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield further?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The employer will say, "Congress has written this specific language. You may not be paid for these things unless there is a contract." Therefore, the workers will by this bill be put in the position of not being able to secure compensation after that, unless, by whatever pressure the worker may be able to bring to bear, he may compel the employer in the future to agree to such compensation.

Mr. COOPER. It would be a matter of negotiation.

Mr. President, in summarizing the provisions of the committee bill for the future, I should like to say again that in the period for the scheduled workday the committee did not legislate, and in that period every right which the worker has secured under the Fair Labor Standards Act is preserved.

Second, in our concept of the term "principal activity," we believe it is sufficiently broad to embrace within its terms such activities as are indispensable to the performance of productive work. Third, we have clearly eliminated from compensation walking, traveling, riding, and other activities which are not an integral part of the employment for which the worker is employed.

I shall repeat that instead of legislating against the Fair Labor Standards Act, instead of attempting to destroy it, this is the first legislation which confirms the interpretations which have been given by the Wage and Hour Administrator prior to this date. We have simply set up standards and criteria.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. PEPPER. The Senator has referred in his discussion with the Senator from Rhode Island to page 48 of the report of the committee, where there are set forth two instances of activities which are so interrelated to principal activities that they could be construed as principal activities and therefore compensable.

What I wanted to ask the Senator was this: Would the activities given in instances 1 and 2 on page 48 of the report to which the Senator referred—

(1) In connection with the operation of a lathe an employee will frequently at the commencement of his workday oil, grease, or clean his machine, or install a new cutting tool. Such activities are an integral part of the principal activity, and are included within such term.

(2) In the case of a garment worker in a textile mill, who is required to report 30 minutes before other employees report to commence their principal activities, and who during such 30 minutes distributes clothing or parts of clothing at the workbenches of other employees and gets machines in readiness for operation by other employees, such activities are among the principal activities of such employee.

If I correctly understand the Senator, those incidental activities are to be construed under part II of the bill dealing with future claims as compensable work, as principal activities. Is that correct?

Mr. COOPER. Excluding the use of the word "incidental." I do not think those activities are incidental. I think they are an integral part of the employment.

Mr. PEPPER. I should like to ask the able Senator from Kentucky: Would workers who have been engaged in such activities as we have just been discussing be precluded under part I of the committee bill, dealing with existing claims, from recovery for such work?

Mr. COOPER. Exactly.

Mr. PEPPER. They would?

Mr. COOPER. I will ask the Senator if he was present when that feature was discussed. We discussed it to some extent earlier.

Mr. PEPPER. Yet the committee itself recognizes that such activities are justly compensable in character?

Mr. COOPER. I have already pointed out that the provision of the committee bill and the provision of the amendment now pending in that respect are exactly the same. If the Senator votes for the amendment now pending he votes to make noncompensable the very activities about which we have been speaking.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. PEPPER. May I also ask the Senator whether he construes the two types of activity which we have just been discussing, which are mentioned on page 48 of the report, as being fairly within the category of portal-to-portal claims.

Mr. COOPER. As defined in the bill they are called portal-to-portal claims, but prior to the Mount Clemens decision they had been interpreted as being compensable under the Fair Labor Standards Act. The reason we adopted this method was that it was a sure and certain way of eliminating the expenditure of billions of dollars in portal-to-portal claims. It became necessary to balance the public interest against the fact that some inequities might be done. We felt that practically there would not be a great number of inequities, because organized labor had already been paid for those activities, and the fair employer has already compensated his employees.

Mr. PEPPER. So the Senator then feels constrained to admit, if he will yield further, that the committee bill and, as he interprets it, the proposed substitute amendment, denies employees who are entitled to compensation for work done, pay for that work; and the justification which the Senator gives for that denial to those people is that it was felt necessary by the committee to cut their claims off in order that some other abuses might be prevented, in the opinion of the committee?

Mr. COOPER. The Senator from Florida has stated the decision which was made. However, I think the way he has stated it is oversimplified. In working for the public interest I think some inequities often result. In making the decision that unanticipated and unearned claims should be invalidated in the public interest, it was necessary to act even if some small inequity resulted.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BALDWIN in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. PEPPER. Will the Senator from Kentucky tell us whether the committee exhausted all other possibilities which it could explore? For example, did it determine what would be the length of time which would be forbidden by the de minimis rule, and did it explore all other possibilities by which it could accomplish what it set out to accomplish; namely, the prevention of vexatious or frivolous or trivial claims which amount substantially to champerty, without denying valid claims for work actually done which should be paid?

Mr. COOPER. In our consideration of the bill I think we did solve this problem. I think it is apparent that even though there are many who would object to any action which might be taken, and even though there are those who would agree that some action should be taken in reference to existing portal-to-portal claims, but would desire that nothing be done in respect to the future, yet no one has suggested any plan other than the one proposed by the committee; and in making that statement I include those who today oppose the committee bill.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. PEPPER. I am thinking out loud in making this inquiry: Suppose the committee started with the elimination of the traveling claims, let us say—in other words, riding between the worker's home and place of work, and perhaps walking from a means of public conveyance to the gate of the factory, and so forth. In other words, suppose the committee had begun by eliminating the movement time which might be consumed by a worker in going to or approximately to his regular place of work. Would not that have eliminated a good many of these claims?

Mr. COOPER. I think the Senator's question suggests the difficulty. He has suggested that we might thus have eliminated walking time to the worker's place of work. Mr. President, under the decision in the Mount Clemens Pottery Co. case, the worker's place of work is held to be at the point where he begins to walk. So we would not have eliminated anything, under the question the Senator from Florida has just propounded.

Mr. PEPPER. Then suppose the committee wished to proceed further. In the Mount Clemens case, I believe, the court found that the time consumed in walking amounted to anywhere from a few seconds up to perhaps as many as 14 minutes at the outside. If the committee had simply eliminated, declared de minimis, or outlawed up to 15 minutes of walking time, would not that have been a considerable step toward the solution of the problem and the elimination of such claims, without denying, as the bill does in effect, the right of recovery to a workman who has done honest work?

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, we took the position, as I have previously stated, that we were not legislating for labor as such or for industry as such, but we were trying to prepare a bill which would be fair to both and would be in the public interest. I suggest to the Senator from Florida that such a rule as he has proposed would make it necessary to investigate and determine the walking time of every employee, and keep records in that respect for every employee, so as to determine whether the employee had in his walking exceeded the de minimis rule which is proposed. Thus, instead of reducing or eliminating this litigation, it would have been increased, as we believe, tenfold.

I say again that we arrived at the decision that comparatively little inequity would be done by this bill. In balancing a possible inequity against the large public interest, in which everyone has an interest, we felt that this provision was fair and equitable.

Let me say, finally, that if we fail to legislate as to the future, in effect we shall perpetuate in the future the same conditions which we see about us today. There would be disputes between employers and employees as to walking time and other portal-to-portal activities. There would be similar disputes as between employees. We might have the very peculiar situation of a number of employees who, as members of one group, all operating lathes in the same factory, and doing the same work, would, nevertheless, be paid different rates of pay. It would be necessary to keep records for every employee, so as to determine whether his walking time or traveling time fell within or without the de minimis rule. Every time an employer changed his factory location and every time the physical facilities within the place of work were changed, again it would be necessary to make a new determination. We think the opportunities for continued litigation and continued dispute would be increased in the future.

It has been said that we should let this matter be settled by collective bargaining. I wish to remind those who make that argument that by the decisions of the court it is impossible to agree or contract to deprive a worker of a right which he has under the statute. So it would be necessary to have a separate agreement as to every worker; and if an agreement did not specifically cover every worker, any worker who was denied any part of his recovery under the Mount Clemens case decision would have a right to abrogate his contract and seek compensation for his minimum wages, overtime compensation, and liquidated damages. So, instead of moving toward and reaching a place where collective bargaining would have strength and stability, we would be moving away from such a position.

I have not been able to attend the meetings of the Committee on Education and Labor, but I have read the committee's reports and I have tried to keep up with them in the newspapers. I have noticed that every great leader of labor and all the great industrial leaders say that the only sound and true way to solve labor disputes is by means of voluntary collective bargaining. Yet, Mr. President, by the interposition of the decision in the Mount Clemens Pottery Co. case, there has been created a condition which would make it necessary to reach a different decision as to every worker; and every time a worker changed his position in the plant, a new decision would have to be made; and no collective-bargaining contract could cover all the workers. So I think such a condition moves away from the goal which both labor and industry seek, in the way of true collective bargaining.

Finally, Mr. President, I should like to say that I believe it is the position of labor, and certainly that of industry—and in this connection I have read the bulletins of the American Federation of Labor and of the Congress of Industrial Organizations, in which they state that it is one of the goals of labor—to apply energy efficiently in order to secure full production and to reduce the unit cost of the product, in order that there may be cheap products available for all people, and in order that the prices of commodities may not be so high as to price the consumer out of the market.

I should like to point out to the Senate that when we add to the cost of products produced in plants and establishments the extra wages of unearned portal-to-portal activities, which in no way enter into the production of goods, and which cannot alter the unit cost of the production of the goods, we have added to the cost of the goods, and that such additional cost must go in only one direction—it must be passed on to the consumer and to labor itself. So if the pending measure shall not be enacted, and if this additional unproductive source of wages shall be continued, we will be adding to the cost of goods, which increase will be passed on to the consumer.

I close by saying that it has been the determined effort of the chairman of the subcommittee and of the members of the subcommittee and of the Members of the majority to produce a bill which would surely and efficiently eliminate portal-to-portal claims of the past. It has been one of our great objectives to place before this body a bill which would preserve to the worker the rights he has gained under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

We have no apology to make for the bill. We believe it to be in the interest of the worker. We see no reason why any Member of this body should fail to support it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] for himself and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr.

McGRATH] as a substitute for parts II, III, and IV of the committee amendment, as amended, being line 19 on page 10 down to and including line 2 on page 23.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, a Senator who deigns to say anything in addition to what has been said on both sides of the pending question exhibits, I am afraid, presumptuousness which is not becoming, for the subject has been ably covered by the debate which has preceded my remarks. Yet, I did want in a few words to register my protest, as strongly as I could, against perhaps the unintended aspects of the proposed legislation.

The country has been thrust into a turmoil, much of which was imaginary, in my opinion, over the so-called portal-to-portal suits. That subject gave rise to the initiation of many suits in many parts of the country for alleged unpaid time compensable under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

This litigation was pending in the courts of this country when the proposed legislation was initiated in the Congress. The legislation therefore has for its avowed purpose either the outlawing of, the imposing of a strict statute of limitations upon, or the constriction of claims which are in process of litigation in the courts.

Mr. President, the rights which are asserted in the courts derive, first, from an enactment of the Congress, and, second, from a pronouncement of the Supreme Court of the United States. Yet, the purpose of the proposed legislation is to deny the citizens of this land rights they assert, and which are now being litigated in the courts of the land, deriving from legislation enacted by the Congress and a decision of the highest court in all the land. Legislation which has that purpose, in my opinion, is subject to the most severe question, and should give rise to the most serious concern.

It has been argued here very ably that that does not impair the constitutional right of any citizen. Perhaps technically it does not, although it is recognized in the Constitution that rights which are vested in character cannot generally be taken away by either a State or the Federal Government without violation of the citizen's constitutional rights, and that is exactly what the legislation proposes to do.

It may be said, however, that the rights which are to be denied if the legislation shall be enacted are rights which accrued pursuant to an act of Congress, and therefore the Congress can take away the right of the citizen by depriving him of the cloak of the statute under which the rights are asserted. As I have said, that may be technically permissible. If it is, it is wrong. Congress should not take away from any citizen a right which has accrued against another citizen of this country and which is in course of litigation in the courts of the land.

I think the proposed legislation therefore does violence to the spirit of the Constitution. I think it exhibits a lack of confidence in the courts of our country unbecoming to a coordinate branch of the Federal Government.

Mr. President, I think the decision rendered by the courts in connection with this subject will bear scrutiny, and will stand up under criticism. The decisions rendered by the United States Supreme Court in both the Tennessee case and in the Jewell Ridge case I think are correct, both in substance and in purpose. I also think that the decision rendered in the Mount Clemens case is a just and righteous decision, and that the way the case is working out it will not impose any undue hardship upon any one.

We have been told here, Mr. President, that there are billions of dollars of these claims pending in the courts, that they will wreck the economy of the land, that they will bankrupt many of the companies of the country. I think it has already been pointed out that the reports that have come to the Congress have come largely either from a cursory examination of the amounts claimed in the complaints—we know as lawyers that the ad damnum clauses of complaints are notoriously excessive of the claims presented in the body of the complaints, as a rule—or from the employers themselves who reported to the Congress the pendency of these numerous and extensive claims. But, Mr. President, I have confidence enough in the courts of this country, in the judges and in the juries, to believe that frivolous and unjust and outrageous claims will be stricken down and denied.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. Would the Senator call "frivolous" a claim which had been approved by the Supreme Court of the United States? Does not that claim have the same validity as any other claim which might be prosecuted on behalf of a workman?

Mr. PEPPER. Is the Senator speaking of the Mount Clemens case?

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. PEPPER. Yes. But, if the Senator will recall, I was saying that the Mount Clemens case is working out. The Supreme Court of the United States sent the case back to the trial court, and the trial court has considered the subject and eliminated a good many of the claims that were involved in the Supreme Court decision, by finding them prohibited by the de minimis rule, or trifling in character. That attests just what the Senator from Florida was saying, that if Congress had left this matter exclusively to the courts of the country, to the judges, and to the juries, and had there been one other thing, the power in the parties to compromise claims, I believe that this matter would have died out and there would have been little injustice done to management in the Nation. Surely, taking everything into consideration, less injustice would have been done to management than is going to be done under this bill to the workers of the country, if the committee bill is adopted by the Congress.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I gladly yield to the Senator.

Mr. COOPER. I have taken it from the Senator's position that he would not deprive the worker of any compensation that is allowed to him by the decision of the courts or by the interpretation of the Fair Labor Standards Act. Does he believe that a settlement between employer and employee would violate that principle?

Mr. PEPPER. I believe that a settlement worked out in good faith, and in the case of unorganized employees, with the approval of the Wage and Hour Administrator, and, in the case of organized employees on their own responsibility, would have been a fair settlement, and that Congress under the circumstances might have aided in the solution of this complicated controversy by giving the parties under this same clause the power to make that kind of compromise. That power to compromise by people who knew the facts, who were the ones concerned, who were on the ground, plus the wisdom of judges and the common sense of juries in this country would in the long run have solved this whole matter far better I venture to say than the Congress of the United States is going to solve it, however long we may continue to consider it.

That, Mr. President, is my view on how this matter should have been handled; but in contradistinction to that course, we come in here, in almost a rage if not a fury, and say that something has got to be done to strike down these portal-to-portal claims.

Assuming, Mr. President, that the portal-to-portal claims should have been stricken down, we have not been satisfied with that. We have not contented ourselves with directly and intentionally invalidating the decisions of the courts of the country on this subject. No, Mr. President, we have not been satisfied with outlawing the portal-to-portal claims. We have gone further and attempted to do two distinctive things: first, to deprive workers who have done honest work of the wages for their toil that were justly due; and, in the second place, so to shorten the statute of limitations that we would take away from them the amount that may have been due them under existing law.

Mr. President, when I say we have gone further than the elimination of the portal-to-portal claims, I go no further than the majority report, on page 48, where it gives two examples of what are activities that should be compensable, that are part of the principal activity, declared to be compensable by the majority report. In the future-claims part of the bill—and I mentioned those before; this is given only as an illustration—one of the examples given is as follows:

> In connection with the operation of a lathe an employee will frequently, at the commencement of his workday, oil, grease, or clean his machine, or install a new cutting tool. Such activities are an integral part of the principal activity, and are included within such term.

And, may I interpolate, made compensable under the statute recommended by the majority committee itself. That is one claim, Mr. President, and all others like it made compensable under the future law by the committee itself, but denied compensation under the part of the statute that deals with existing claims. So I say that is not a portal-to-portal claim. There was no justification for outlawing that kind of claim, especially when the courts of the land held that workers who performed those activities were entitled to compensation. We strike down an adjudicated right under the law of the land, the right of people performing those activities.

I cite a second illustration, given not by the Senator from Florida but by the committee itself, as entitled to compensation:

> In the case of a garment worker in a textile mill, who is required to report 30 minutes before other employees report to commence their principal activities, and who during such 30 minutes, distributes clothing or parts of clothing at the work benches of other employees and gets machines in readiness for operation by other employees, such activities are among the principal activities of such employee.

And I interpolate, by the committee itself, declared to be in the future part of this act, subject to compensation; yet they are denied compensation under the part of the statute recommended by the committee that deals with existing claims.

Mr. President, that is not portal to portal; so this is not a portal-to-portal bill, not a bill denying portal-to-portal claims. This is a bill which denies honest workmen honest pay for the work they have done, adjudicated to be due them by the highest court in this land.

Mr. President, is that morally, if technically, right? The committee gave these two cases merely by way of illustration. There are others—checking machinery by the worker before he begins to perform what are called his principal activities for pay; adjusting and readjusting safety equipment. After all, Mr. President, adjusting and readjusting safety equipment not only saves the man, it saves the worker for the company. He does that on the premises of the employer. It is related to his work in an essential way; yet he, like the man who checks machinery, Mr. President, would be denied pay for the work he has done, under the committee bill. So does the man who adjusts and readjusts safety equipment receive from this committee a prohibition of the collection of his claim in the courts of the land. Another is one engaged in repairing, oiling, or washing machines. That would be, under the committee bill, compensable in the future but not compensable in the past. Others are checking and sharpening tools; rest periods after arduous toils; inventory taking; periodical physical examination when performed upon the premises of the employer and required by the employer; travel time in plants or mines for some considerable time; cleaning and washing off dirt, and the like.

Those are just a few cases, Mr. President, which have been called to my attention as claims as to existing rights that will be denied under the committee bill if it should be adopted, but would be recognized under the committee bill as to future rights. So I say that I see no reason why the committee should have made a distinction between the past and the future in the recognition of what was compensable work.

Mr. President, this legislation in the first place, therefore, attacks the integrity of judicial decisions in respect to accrued claims of workers. I say that if not technically wrong it is morally wrong for the Congress of the United States to permit it. I say it is a repudiation of the orderly processes of law under which this country is governed; that it is a discrimination against a worthy segment of its citizenry, and does them an injustice. Therefore, I say it is conduct unbecoming to the Congress of the United States.

In the second place, Mr. President, in respect to past claims it denies claims that are not portal-to-portal claims for it allows recovery only in two categories of cases: Work that is compensable in the first place under an agreement written or oral, and in the second place, under what amounts to an agreement which is determined by the custom prevailing in the enterprise where the worker is employed.

Mr. President, what do we find has been the discovery in the past by the Wage and Hour Administration as to whether workers have been getting what was due them by the employers of the country. I am referring now to the very able remarks made by the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. McGRATH] former Solicitor General of the United States, in this body on March 19, in which the Senator pointed out:

> The small figures representing employee suits and complaints do not mean that the rest of the employers were complying with the act. But because of the apparent attitude of the majority of the committee, I think we should give careful attention to these facts. One-half of the 42,000 establishments inspected in 1946 were in violation of major provisions of the act, 38 percent of those inspected in substantial violation. In that one year alone the Division found over $21,000,000 due as back wages, and this money was owed to 365,000 employees. This was a year of generally high wages and high profits, yet 11 percent of the establishments inspected were in violation of the minimum wage provisions of the act. They would not pay 40 cents an hour.

Yet I venture to say, Mr. President, that the committee bill will outlaw nearly every one of such claims, and if the Wage and Hour Administration found that degree of nonpayment—that degree of violation in 1946—I dare say no less degree of violation exists in 1947, and probably no less would exist in subsequent years. Yet the Congress of the United States, under the lash of those who want what they call portal-to-portal legislation, are denying, according to known experience, 365,000 people who are workmen and workwomen, as a minimum, the right to recover $21,000,000, and that represents only a portion of the whole number because that is the discovery from the limited investigation the Wage and Hour Administration was able to make.

Now, Mr. President, is that right? Are we compelled to do that to satisfy the demand to protect the employer against the frivolous or the fictitious or the champertous portal-to-portal suit? I do not think so.

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. BALDWIN. The argument made by the able Senator from Florida brings out a point which I want to clear up in my mind. I understood that he read on page 48 of the report of the committee two examples. One was:

> In connection with the operation of a lathe an employee will frequently at the commencement of his workday oil, grease, or clean his machine—

And so forth. The other example was in connection with material distributed in a garment factory, say, to the machines of the workers, and the query was whether or not the time spent in distributing the material would constitute compensable time.

I understood the Senator to claim that these two examples, as set forth in the report, are examples of compensable time under the Wage and Hour Act which the portal-to-portal bill, so called, would completely outlaw. It seems to me that if particular activities such as those mentioned in the two examples should hereafter by contract or custom be paid for, this proposed legislation would not bar such claims. Is that not correct?

Mr. PEPPER. That is correct. If I excluded the assumption that if they were covered, either by express written contract or were being compensated for in the past, why, of course, I did not intend to give any such impression.

Mr. BALDWIN. I received that impression. Perhaps the Senator did not say that.

Mr. PEPPER. I am glad the Senator called attention to it.

Mr. BALDWIN. Will the Senator again yield?

Mr. PEPPER. Yes.

Mr. BALDWIN. There is one further point I should like to make. Is it not true that under the bill as drafted by the committee, if there is a borderline situation, not so clear-cut as these cases, but a borderline situation, an employee would still have the opportunity to go into court and press his claim and establish that either by contract or by custom his particular claim fell in the compensable class? Would that not still be possible?

Mr. PEPPER. Let me go back just a little bit earlier. The Senator also I am sure will acknowledge that if these claims—and it is the reason that I left them out of my remarks—if these claims had been the subject of express agreement in the past or if they had been paid for in the past by custom, of course they would not exist today and there would not be a necessity to outlaw a claim that a workman would not be presenting in a court. So what I am saying is, to clear up the first inquiry made by the Senator, that any existing claim which is in a court is, I think we are bound to assume, not covered by an express contract, written or oral, and not subject to compensation by custom.

Now as to the second point raised by the Senator from Connecticut, I will have to say that the committee bill and to a certain degree the McCarran-McGrath amendment in this particular respect, it has been alleged, limit recovery to two categories, and only to two categories at the present time: Either a claim that is subject to an oral or a written agreement, or that has been compensable in the past pursuant to a custom, and there is no penumbra. I do not see anything that the worker could prove in the court when the court asked him, "Is this covered by contract?" and the worker said "No," and if the question were asked, "In the past has the employer ever paid you and other workingmen for that kind of work performed?" and the worker said, "No; the employer has not been paying me, and that is why I am here."

What I am saying to the Senator is that I do not see how many of this penumbra—any of those who are in the shadows of these two cases mentioned, would have anything they could show in court in view of the legislation that is proposed by the committee.

Mr. BALDWIN. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. BALDWIN. I am as anxious and as earnest in my anxiety as is the Senator from Florida that the act be so drawn as to exclude only the frivolous, so-called frivolous, if we want to call them such, portal-to-portal claims, and at the same time still give the worker the opportunity to enforce what he is entitled to under a contract, written or oral; still give him an opportunity to enforce what he is entitled to by custom, and further still give him an opportunity to come into court and prove what the custom was or what the personal agreement was. It seems to me that that narrows the question down as much as it can possibly be narrowed.

Mr. PEPPER. I believe the able Senator is not taking into consideration where the narrowing is done, where the shoe pinches. It pinches the employee. This bill says in substance, "You cannot go into court and collect for a claim for which you have not been paid in the past."

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. President——

Mr. PEPPER. I know what the Senator is about to say. He is about to say that the bill does not so provide. Let me read what the committee bill provides:

> No employer shall be subject to any liability or punishment under the Walsh-Healey Act or the Bacon-Davis Act on account of the failure of such employer to pay an employee minimum wages, or to pay an employee overtime compensation, for or on account of any of the following activities, hereinafter termed portal-to-portal activities, of such employee engaged in on or after the date of enactment of this act—
> (a) walking, riding, or traveling to and from the actual place of performance of the principal activity or activities which such employee is employed to perform, and
> (b) activities which were preliminary to or postliminary to said principal activity or activities, which occur either prior to the time on any particular workday at which such employee commences, or subsequent to the time on any particular workday at which he ceases, such principal activity or activities: Provided, however, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to any of the foregoing portal-to-portal activities of such employee which is compensable by either—
> (1) an express provision of a written or nonwritten contract in effect, at the time of such activity, between such employee, his agent, or collective-bargaining representative and his employer; or
> (2) a custom or practice in effect, at the time of such activity, at the establishment or other place where such employee is employed, covering such activity, not inconsistent with a written or nonwritten contract, in effect at the time of such activity, between such employee, his agent, or collective-bargaining representative and his employer.

I am saying that if the activity in question had been the subject of a contract in the past, I do not suppose any employer would deny that he should perform his contract, or that the committee desires to relieve any employer of his duty to discharge his contract. Secondly, if the claim in question had been compensable by reason of the custom of the establishment, and recognized as such, I do not suppose that the committee would make any effort to exempt the employer from his duty to pay claims which it had been the custom in the past to recognize. None of us would claim that the employers of the country have not paid claimants on those two bases. But what we are talking about is an asserted claim not coming under either the custom or a contract in the past; and I am saying that the committee proposes to eliminate every claim up to date which does not come within the category of a contract or under the sovereignty of a custom.

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JENNER in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. BALDWIN. Is it not exactly in that field that we have had so much confusion? The portal-to-portal claims—at least those in the State of Connecticut—were instituted in cases in which neither by contract, written or oral, or by custom theretofore, had the time claimed for been compensable. So it seems to me that we narrow the question down to the field in which neither by custom nor contract theretofore was the time compensable. So the bill does no more than deal specifically with a group of situations with respect to which there is bound to be a great deal of uncertainty. It seems to me that one of the primary legislative purposes is to try to clear up any doubts or uncertainties in existing legislation. As I understand, that is exactly what the bill attempts to do, for the benefit not only of the employer but also of the employee.

I thank the Senator for yielding to me.

Mr. PEPPER. I thank the able Senator. I know how solicitous he is that no injustice be done. But the Senator says that all the bill does is to lay down the two categories, which he implies are relatively simple and clear-cut. What I wish to emphasize to the able Senator from Connecticut is that the bill cuts off everyone except those who come within two limited categories. We are not merely saying that we are eliminating the claims of all who come within those categories. We are saying that we are prohibiting the claim of everyone who does not come within those categories. The vice of that action is that we would elminate the claims of many persons who are performing the very kind of work which the committee recognizes on page 48 of the report and in the committee bill. They are engaged in compensable work; but we are denying them recovery because in the past they have not been justly paid. They do not come within the contract category, and they do not come within the custom category.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I shall be glad to yield in just a moment.

Let me say to my able friend from Connecticut that this action falls with particular severity upon the unorganized worker. Let me give some examples. Several examples have already been given.

In the South, where it is my privilege to live, a new enterprise or a new factory may be established, giving employment to the women of the community. That is certainly a desirable objective. However, too often—if not generally—those women will be told, "Come here half an hour before the time to go to work and get your machines ready, get your needles threaded, get your materials laid out, or get your patterns fitted. Get everything ready on your time."

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at this point?

Mr. PEPPER. If it will please my friend from Connecticut, I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. BALDWIN. I should very much like to have the Senator yield at this point.

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. BALDWIN. My learned friend from Florida, for whose ability and oratory I have high respect, has stated a case in Florida in which certain time would not be compensated for. The case is almost on all-fours with the first category. In my State of Connecticut there would be no question that the time would be compensated for. So I submit that my learned friend must get a better case than that.

Mr. PEPPER. Let us see whether the Senator from Connecticut or the Senator from Florida has a point. I am assuming that the Senator from Connecticut knows that under the terms of the committee bill the cases referred to on page 48 are compensable only in the future, and not in the past. Does the Senator recognize that?

Mr. BALDWIN. I did not so understand.

Mr. PEPPER. That is where the able Senator was in error. If the committee had laid down the same principle as to existing claims, it would have been a far-reaching step.

I am grateful for the generous words of my distinguished friend. The very point I was making, and had made a little earlier, before the Senator entered the Chamber, was that in the committee report certain types of claims were recognized as compensable in the future; but the committee proposed to cut off compensation for the same kind of claims arising in the past.

I was speaking of the situation in the South, where workers are required to be present 30 minutes ahead of time. It may be said that they do it voluntarily. Practically every worker does what he or she is directed to, for the simple reason that he must work in order to live. The point that is often overlooked is that a survey was made a little while ago by the Federal Reserve Board, and it was found that only two families out of five in America had total liquid savings of as much as $40. Such workers cannot say, "I will not come to work half an hour early." If coming to work half an hour early is made a condition of the job, they will come half an hour early. If they are required to come an hour early, they will come an hour early, because most of them must work.

What I am saying, Mr. President, is that in the past unorganized workers have been required to do just that kind of thing—to start work earlier than they are paid for and at the end of the day to work longer than they are paid for. For example, the lady to whom I referred may be required to remain after the whistle blows or the bell rings and spend 30 minutes cleaning up for the next day, on her time, not on the company's time. That is an hour, in the case which I put—30 minutes in the morning and 30 minutes in the afternoon—time which she is required to put in for the benefit of the employer; and under this bill every single one of them will be denied the right to recover. What I am saying is that they would not have filed claims if that right had been recognized by the employer in the past under contract or custom.

I know what a problem the committee has had to struggle with. I have never been one of those who criticized the length of time the committee has had the matter under consideration. I know something of the complexity of the problem. Yet surely the committee cannot blame me or other Senators for not wanting to take away from these honest workers the money they have coming to them under existing statute law and the decisions of the United States Supreme Court. It is not right, and I do not believe that I am forced to do these workers that injustice in order to find an effective method to prevent champertous portal-to-portal suits in the courts.

Mr. FERGUSON, Mr. MCMAHON, and Mr. DONNELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield first to the Senator from Michigan for a moment, and then I will yield to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCMAHON].

Mr. FERGUSON. I ask the Senator from Florida, with reference to past claims, if he finds any distinction between the committee bill and the substitute bill.

Mr. PEPPER. I will say to my able friend from Michigan with the utmost candor that from the reading which I have been able to give the two I am not satisfied about the existence of a distinction. However, Senators who have drafted them have asserted that there is a distinction. Whether or not there is a distinction will have to be sustained by them. With respect to existing claims, I do not see, from a reading of the language, any particular difference between the substitute and the committee bill. But, of course, the Senator recognizes that the McCarran-McGrath substitute imposes no limitations upon future claims, whereas the committee bill does impose such limitations. The McCarran-McGrath substitute also does not go to the point of outlawing judicial decisions. There are many more restraints or prohibitions, even as to existing claims, in the committee bill, however, than there are in the substitute bill.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Whether we used more language in the original bill than in the substitute, there is an attempt by both the bill and the substitute to abolish all claims existing in and by virtue of the Fair Labor Standards Act as interpreted or to be interpreted by the Supreme Court if it is not under contract or custom or practice. Both bills outlaw such causes of action; and so far as the workingman is concerned, the effect upon him would be identical whether or not we attempt in the original bill to take more away from him than is done in the substitute bill. Is not that a fact?

Mr. PEPPER. I have tried to be honest in answering the Senator's question. As I said, however, he must have heard the arguments made by the able Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. MCGRATH] and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN]. They assert that there is a difference between the two proposals. There are more things in the committee bill as to existing claims than there are in the substitute. For example, all the substitute does is to provide that to recover the right has to be asserted under either contract or custom. It says no more. However, the committee bill provides that all claims have to come under contract or custom to be the basis of recovery, and it goes further and provides:

> For the purposes of this section, no judicial or administrative interpretation of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, the Walsh-Healey Act, or the Bacon-Davis Act, shall have the effect of changing any written or nonwritten contract between the employer and the employee so as to make compensable any portal-to-portal activities.

As the able Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BALDWIN] stated a moment ago, there may be in the substitute a sort of penumbra, an area on the circumference, as it were, and the courts might find for the claimant even in respect to the portal-to-portal portion of a claim; but under the committee bill even a judicial decision which might give compensation to a worker is outlawed if the claim does not come under one category or the other.

Let me go back to page 11, from which I was reading:

> Nor shall any provision of any such contract, incorporating by reference as a part thereof such judicial or administrative interpretations, make compensable any such portal-to-portal activities.

In other words, even a court decision cannot be incorporated in the contract and made binding upon an employer.

Mr. FERGUSON. I beg to differ with the Senator. One may contract in relation to anything.

Mr. PEPPER. What is the meaning of the words—

> Nor shall any provision of any such contract, incorporating by reference as a part thereof such judicial or administrative interpretations, make compensable any such portal-to-portal activities.

Mr. FERGUSON. I will explain that provision.

Mr. PEPPER. I should be glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. FERGUSON. If a contract is drafted simply providing in general terms "This contract is drafted in the light of the Fair Labor Standards Act," or even if it contains no clause in reference to the act, if nothing else were said and this bill did not exist, later a court could interpret it as meaning that it included the interpretation of that act by the Supreme Court. It is the intent of the committee to allow no such interpretations to be read into a contract. It is possible to contract in specific terms to pay for any labor in any form, but it cannot be done in general terms so as to bring about a situation such as we have today. After years had gone by, neither the employer nor the employee, nor the Government, which was collecting taxes from the work of the employee, had any idea that there was any liability. We let it accumulate for an 8-year period, and then we found a large amount of lawsuits upsetting the economy, upsetting the taxpayer, upsetting the Nation, for that matter, due to a decision by the Supreme Court which, in effect, is legislation.

It is not and was not the intention of Congress, as I view it, as interpreted by either employee or employer, that certain things should be paid for. After all, we must have the Supreme Court; we must have its decisions.

Mr. PEPPER. I am glad that the Senator does not contemplate the abolition of the Supreme Court.

Mr. FERGUSON. No. I am one who stands for court decisions. But in this particular case we find that the court has, in my humble judgment, legislated. It went much further than the legislature intended to go, and said that included in the workweek is a certain portal-to-portal activity. Next month the Supreme Court may say that portal-to-portal pay shall start from the time a man leaves his door in the morning until he returns at night, or it may say that it shall start when he parks his car. So by this legislation we are attempting to say that that is not included up to the present day, and shall not be included up to the present day, if it is not included by virtue of contract, custom, or practice; and that in the future it shall not be included unless it is included in a contract or by custom or by practice.

The act is very broad; yes. But if we are to abolish the present confusion, as it were, we must do it either by means of adopting the language of the bill or, I believe, the language of the substitute bill, in respect to past cases. But if the bill which is passed is limited to past cases, then in the future the Congress must determine what shall be the policy, and whether in 4 or 5 years, because of an interpretation of the Fair Labor Standards Act—and I do not wish to abolish it; I think this limitation is a fair one—the Congress will have to say that it will not face a situation of piling up lawsuit upon lawsuit and having them litigated, 4 or 5 years from now, just as they are being litigated today. That is the way I analyze this bill.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Michigan, and I think he makes the situation very clear; namely, that when the whole thing is boiled down and concentrated in a capsule, what we have is that the United States Supreme Court has decided some litigation favorably to the workers of America, and the United States Congress proposes to reverse the decision of the Supreme Court. That is what this matter comes down to.

Mr. O'MAHONEY and Mr. DONNELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield first to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, the question which was directed to the Senator from Florida by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON] suggested to my mind an interesting interpretation of the language to which the Senator from Florida originally alluded. I read now from page 11 of the bill, beginning with line 19:

> For the purposes of this section, no judicial or administrative interpretation of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, the Walsh-Healey Act, or the Bacon-Davis Act, shall have the effect of changing any written or nonwritten contract.

Let us assume there was a written contract which, in the view of the parties or from the point of view of the worker, incorporated some provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act. Let us assume that a dispute then arose between the employer and the employee. This language would have the effect, would it not, of saying that in connection with that dispute between the worker and the employer, no court could by any possibility pass judgment as to whether that written contract did, in fact, incorporate a provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Mr. PEPPER. The Senator is absolutely correct.

Mr. President, it will be shocking to those who in a calmer day than this one look back upon this measure, if it is passed—and I assume it will be passed, because the enactment of such legislation seems to be assured in this Congress, and such action may vindicate the statement, which someone made a few days ago, that this is the worst Congress in 25 years, although I do not know whether that is a fair criticism—but I say that people who examine this legislation in a calmer moment hereafter will be shocked, I think, at the length to which this legislation proposes to go to oust the courts of the United States from jurisdiction in the interpretation of Federal statutes and the interpretation of contracts between employers and employees. By this measure we in the Congress would practically say that if a court construed the legislation or a contract in a way which we did not like, we would outlaw it by act of Congress.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I gladly yield to my friend.

Mr. DONNELL. I should like to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the provision to which he has referred, on page 11 of the bill, namely "For the purposes of this section, no judicial or administrative interpretation of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, the Walsh-Healey Act, or the Bacon-Davis Act shall have the effect of changing any written or nonwritten contract between the employer and employee so as to make compensable any portal-to-portal activities," contains the further language "(as defined in sec. 5)."

Mr. President, section 5 defines portal-to-portal activities as being—

> Those activities which section 2 hereof provides shall not be a basis of liability or punishment under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, the Walsh-Healey Act, or the Bacon-Davis Act.

In other words, Mr. President, all that the portion between lines 19 and 25, on page 11 of the bill, does is to say that where there is a written or nonwritten contract between an employer and an employee, no decision of a court or no interpretation of any administrative bureau or agency shall be permitted to change that contract from one which by its terms provides that certain activities shall be noncompensable, and make the contract contrary to what the parties have said it shall be.

Mr. President, I wish to say that the Senator from Florida is treading on ground where there is no occasion whatsoever to fear the exercise of the power, which he has here envisaged, in such a way as to amount to encroachment by the legislative department upon the judicial department of government. This provision merely means that where a contract makes an activity noncompensable, the mere fact that a court later says it shall be compensable shall not make it compensable.

Let me add one word, if the Senator will indulge me for a further moment: The Mount Clemens case decision and the results it has brought—so dangerous to our national economy—are in large part, to my mind, due to the fact that in that case the Supreme Court decided that work of that character must be included in the statutory workweek and must be compensated accordingly, regardless of contrary custom or contract.

So, Mr. President, by means of this provision, our bill recognizes the fact that is is proper for the legislative body to say that when parties have entered into a contract, no judicial interpretation or decision or no interpretation by an administrative bureau or agency shall change the contract from the one the parties have made.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, let me ask the able Senator from Missouri a question—and he is a very able lawyer, and he has been most industrious in this matter. Question has been raised as to whether it is constitutional for this measure to deprive workers of accrued claims under the decisions of the court. That question has arisen; has it not?

Mr. DONNELL. Yes.

Mr. PEPPER. The able Senator from Missouri has exhaustively examined the matter, and has concluded that this legislation would be constitutional; and he has made the basis of his argument the position that when the parties enter into a contract or when private rights are otherwise derived, they are always derived subject to public law. Have I stated the matter correctly?

Mr. DONNELL. That is correct; but——

Mr. PEPPER. I wish to ask the Senator from Missouri——

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I had not finished my answer.

Mr. PEPPER. Very well.

Mr. DONNELL. My answer is that when Congress has power to legislate within a certain domain, any contract in that domain, entered into by individuals, is subject to the right of Congress to change and alter and annul it.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Missouri another question. When A and B enter into a contract not to make compensable work which, under the statute, as construed by the only agency which we have to construe statutes—namely, the courts—is made compensable, is not such a contract invalid, according to the same logic and the same argument which the able Senator from Missouri has to use as the basis of his asserted claim of the constitutionality of this proposed statute? In other words, if the law says that a worker must be paid a minimum of 40 cents an hour, but if the parties agree that the worker shall be paid only 18 cents an hour, if a court later finds that only 18 cents an hour is being paid, notwithstanding that contract, though it be in writing, will not the parties be bound by the law as construed by the court?

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I shall answer the Senator from Florida by saying, "Certainly. No one has denied that fact, either directly or indirectly."

But that is not the situation in which the Senator is interested here. Here Congress is declaring the law. Here Congress is saying that if the Senator from Florida and I enter into a contract, he as the employer and I as the employee, and if by that contract a particular activity is not compensable, no judicial decision or administrative interpretation shall make compensable that which the Senator and I have, by our contract, determined to be not compensable.

I may complete my answer by saying that in other words, Congress has the power, within the domain of interstate commerce, to lay down regulations and laws which will supersede what the private individuals may do, but at the same time Congress has a perfect right to say that if two individuals do contract that such and such shall be compensable or noncompensable, no judicial decision which comes along and says to the contrary shall be allowed to set aside the contract

Mr. PEPPER. If the Senator will allow me, when the Congress says that the worker shall not work more than 40 hours a week without being compensated at a certain rate for overtime in excess of the 40 hours, and if the court finds that a man has been made to work more than 40 hours and has not been compensated for the overtime, does the existence of even a written contract that he shall not be compensated for the overtime save the employer in the courts of the country from liability?

Mr. DONNELL. It certainly does not. As I said a few minutes ago, Congress has laid down the law, and no contract can supersede it, but in like manner Congress can write a law to the effect that if the distinguished Senator and I enter into a contract saying that my employment of him or his of me shall not be compensated, Congress can lay down the law saying that no decision of a court or of an administrative bureau shall violate and negative what he and I have agreed to.

Mr. PEPPER. In other words, the purpose of the bill is to deprive workers of recovery on claims which the courts of the land, including the Supreme Court, have held valid.

Mr. DONNELL. No, Mr. President. I have said what the result of this particular provision is, and later this afternoon I shall discuss very fully the purpose of the bill.

I think the Senator has probably overlooked one fact. There is no definition in the bill, from start to finish, there is none within the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from Rhode Island, of the term "work." Therefore, Mr. President, were it true that the Senator from Florida and I were to enter into a contract of employment wherein either the word "work" or any synonym of it were used, and our contract was brought into the courts for the purpose of determining whether I, as an employee, was entitled to walking time from the time I entered the plant to the moment I reached the lathe at which I was employed, the court might very properly say, "Here is your contract. I see the word 'work' in it. I see by the decision of Mr. Justice Murphy that under the Fair Labor Standards Act 'work' includes walking time. Therefore I incorporate into this contract, by reference, the contents of the decision of the Supreme Court."

Mr. President, it was in order that there should be no such situation as that, by which, after we get through with enacting the statute we are considering, we would be just where we started. For that reason the portions between lines 19 and 25 were inserted in the bill. As a result of that, in order for a worker to be entitled to recover for any activities, it is necessary, under part II of the bill, pertaining to existing claims, that he shall prove, not by some incorporation by reference, not by some Supreme Court decision, not by some ruling of the OPA or some other bureau, but by the definite provisions of a contract, that he is entitled to compensation for those activities.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I think it is only fair that we have an understanding about one thing. I was a little surprised that the distinguished Senator from Missouri seemed to be unwilling to admit it. Let us see if we cannot be clear.

The whole reason for the proposed legislation is because of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in three cases—the Tennessee case, the Jewell Ridge case, and the Mount Clemens case. Under those three cases rights were given or recognized and claims were filed for the recovery of money under those cases, and the whole purpose of the pending legislation is to take those rights away, and to make those claims invalid. Therefore, does the Senator deny that the purpose of the legislation is to set aside the decision of the United States Supreme Court rendered as to what constitutes compensable work for the working men and women of America?

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, it may be that the opening two or three words of my response have perhaps justly given occasion to some confusion in the mind of the Senator, or perhaps they were confused in my own statement. I welcome this opportunity to state the occasion for the legislation.

The occasion was that in the Mount Clemens case various activities, including walking time and preliminary time, have been held by the Court to be compensable, notwithstanding contrary custom or contract as to the walking time—and I take it likewise it would be true as to preliminary activities. As a result of that decision, great surprise has come to industry from one end of this Nation to the other, and a condition injurious to the economy of the Nation has resulted, as I have indicated.

It was exactly as the Senator has said, in order to set aside, annul, and forever cancel and make void these suits which have been filed based upon that decision of the Supreme Court, that this legislation is before us.

If there was anything in the opening portion of my answer which in any sense conflicts with that—and I can readily see as I look back over the early part of my answer, it might be susceptible to it—and was contrary, perhaps, I want to say that that was the theory of the legislation from beginning to the end.

Mr. PEPPER. I thank the Senator for his characteristic candor and fairness to his colleagues. I just did not want any misunderstanding to exist as to that.

So, Mr. President, we now see that we in the Congress are called upon to take away from the working men and women in America rights the courts of this land say they have.

Mr. President, I will not vote for that kind of legislation. It is not right. Not only that, but the courts of the land can be trusted to give a square deal, they can be trusted to give fair interpretation to the provisions of a contract. If they do not, what hope is there for the vitality and the preservation of our institutions?

Surely Congress is not going to constitute itself a court of appeals to reverse every decision of the United States Supreme Court which it does not like. I am not in favor of our becoming a court of appeals to reverse a decision happening to be made for the benefit of the workers of America. Nor would I be an instrument—and I never have been in the Congress—attempting to take away rights which may be conferred upon other segments of the population by the courts of the land.

I know that since I have been in the Senate attempts have been made to circumvent the decisions of the United States Supreme Court. Senators on this floor will recall that not so long ago there was the charge that the fire-insurance companies were violating the anti-trust laws, in the case of the Southeastern Underwriters. The lower court had made a decision in the case, and an effort was made in the Congress to have us intervene while that case was on the way from the district court in Georgia to the United States Supreme Court, and declare a rule or promulgate a law that would thwart the jurisdiction of the United States Supreme Court. We did not adopt the legislation as proposed. There have been other instances in which we have been called upon to intervene because some did not like the results of a judicial decision. I am proud of the record of our Congress for not having lent itself to such an unworthy endeavor.

Mr. President, I believe that the courts have rightly decided the cases we have been considering, so far as I am individually concerned. I am not the only Member of this body who has done honorable work in public enterprises of this country and know something about walking time and other effort for the employer not now compensable. I walked three-quarters of a mile from the gate of a steel mill to the place where I was to do my work. I do not see but that after I got on the premises my time was compensable, but I was not getting the benefit of it. There are other cases in which the working people get their tools ready when they are getting ready for the day's work, or where there is work to be done after the principal activities of the day.

I think the Supreme Court was right. Certainly, whether they are right or wrong, there is no basis for Congress assuming to assert and arrogate to itself the duty to review a decision just because it may not happen to like the decision.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida has been making a very valuable contribution to the discussion on this bill. As I listen to him speak, and listen to his interrogatories addressed to the Senator from Missouri in relation to the bill, it becomes more and more clear that what the Senator from Florida has said is absolutely correct.

The bill before us seems to me to make it absolutely clear that its purpose is to deprive the courts of the United States of jurisdiction over all suits for portal-to-portal compensation, regardless of whether those suits are based upon contract, written or unwritten, or based merely upon the statute itself.

I call the attention of the Senate to the language in paragraph (c) on page 12:

(c) No court shall have jurisdiction of any action for minimum wages, overtime compensation, or liquidated damages under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, the Walsh-Healey Act, or the Bacon-Davis Act, whether instituted prior to, on or after the date of enactment of this act, to the extent that such action seeks to enforce any liability with respect to any claim based on portal-to-portal activities.

So all the language here concerning written and unwritten contracts, and custom and practice in the industry, means nothing when interpreted in the light of this language. If Congress should adopt this language, it will be saying to the workers of America: "No court in the land can interpret this contract that you have, this custom or practice that you have, so far as it affects portal-to-portal activity."

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, the conclusion arrived at by the able Senator from Wyoming is inescapable to me.

In mentioning instances in which the Congress is called upon to set aside and to exempt the jurisdiction of the courts, I hope I commit no impropriety, in the absence of one of the sponsors of the bill, but there is a bill pending here now that proposes to exempt the railroads of the country from violation of the antitrust law by congressional enactment, to give them specific permission to do things which presumably under the jurisdiction of the courts would be found to be violative of the antitrust law.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, may I add that it is a bill dealing with a question involved in a case that is now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. PEPPER. That is another instance in which a case is now pending in the United States Supreme Court, and it is proposed that we should come along and oust the jurisdiction of the highest court of the land in a case pending before it, by legislation.

Mr. President, we like to say here, that we legislate impartially, we legislate objectively, we legislate without discrimination, and we, under our system, justify legislation of that character. Matters of contract interpretation and of statutory interpretation must be left to the courts of this land. We cannot define every case in which there may be liability or nonliability. In fact, the Court itself cannot do that sort of thing. It is decisions of inclusion and exclusion by the courts of the land that has led to the development and the broadening of our law from the beginning of this Nation.

Mr. President, the due process clause in the United States Constitution is not for interpretation by Congress. We leave that to the courts, and they determine what comes under it, and what does not. They apply it, and they hold it is not applicable. That is a part of our system which we cherish, that part of our great constitutional system that is so enviable, we think, in our structure, and yet, Mr. President, because the courts in a particular case happen to have made some rulings and laid down certain interpretations which we do not like, and which management protests, the Congress is supposed to get into a fury and into a fret; it is said the emergency is so acute that we must pass this portal-to-portal legislation before we confirm the Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission, before we determine the line of succession in case of the Presidency of the United States, before we pass a minimum-wage bill, before we pass health legislation, legislation to aid our public school system, or even, Mr. President, before we pass upon a matter of vital concern to the peace of the world. All those things must wait while we, in the Congress, determine the language of the statutes by which we propose to assert the congressional will in the place of the judicial power of the United States of America.

Mr. President, I said the employers are making a remonstrance over it. I have the figures here to show that, up to June 30, 1946, there had been a total of about .. billion dollars of tax refunds that have been paid out to a lot of those who may be classified as "remonstrating management." We know that management in America today enjoys the highest peacetime profits in the history of America. That remonstrating management is against some additional claims that the workers may have in the courts of the country. Yes, we are also told, Mr. President, by Mr. Wendell Berge, that monopoly in America today is at its all-time peak.

What concerns me, Mr. President, is the trend that I discover in the Congress today to regard more the man at the top than the man at the bottom of the ladder in our economy. What concerns me is what has been done to OPA, and what that has meant to the standard of living of the American people, and the profits that have been added to the manufacturers and the producers and the processors of this land under what we have done here in the Congress. Yes, what concerns me, Mr. President, is what we have already done to rent control. I say, what we have already done—we enacted an appropriation bill here the other day, which for all practical purposes means that rent control, if there is no other legislation adopted, will end in this country on the 30th day of April of this year. What does that mean? That means rents will go up, just as prices have gone up, for the working man. Is anybody shedding any crocodile tears in this Congress about prices going up, and rents going up for the working men and women of this country, including the veterans? No, we heard nothing about Congress making haste to enact further OPA legislation to protect the housewife. We just let the producer and the manufacturer and the processor get what he could. We did not intervene, and I do not see Congress concocting any hasty legislation to preserve rent control, either. We debated it here the other day, and we lost—those of us who were trying to prevent the elimination of rent control, many of us thought, by indirection, in the appropriation bill, when exactly contrary to the language that authorized that control in a statute until June 30 of this year. They cut out the money, after the 30th day of April, with which to carry it on. It is like the fellow that did not fire the working man, he just quit paying him.

What concerns me, Mr. President, is, in the income tax proposal, the principal concern has been for the fellow in the high brackets. Ah! "A 20-percent cut across the board." It looks fine. One might say, "Twenty percent is as good for one man as it is for another." The difference is, it would mean substantially that the man who now has $20,000 net would have $40,000, whereas the fellow who has but little left would have only a little more. That is the difference, Mr. President, the difference between having a few dollars and $40,000 left, after the payment of taxes, or something comparable to that.

Mr. President, with respect to wages, we cannot pass a minimum wage law. If the Senator from Florida or any other Senator were to offer an amendment to the pending bill to raise the minimum wage under the Fair Labor Standards Act which we are so glibly amending, so hastily striving to amend, why such a Senator would be frowned upon here. The look in Senators' faces would be so sharp that one would think such a Senator had committed the grossest of improprieties. If we are going to amend the wage-hour law we should save further consideration and debate on the subject by inserting a provision for a minimum 75 cents an hour wage in the pending bill. Let us extend coverage to millions of people who deserve to be covered. But what concerns me, Mr. President, is that so many who vote for tax revisions for the larger taxpayer, so many who vote to abolish OPA, so many who vote to do away with rent control, so many who try to strike down the danger of working men or working women getting what the Court has said is due them, are never in favor of that kind of thing, that is, to increase the wages of the worker. Or if it is a question of building homes for the people of this country, including the veterans, it is so seldom that we find those who are trying to do away with OPA and rent control and such things leading the fight for more homes for the families and for the veterans of the country. That is what concerns me, Mr. President. That is what I am afraid lays us open to the criticism that we are thinking, as I said, more about the man at the top than we are the family at the bottom of our economic ladder.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. And that thinking is going on despite the plain fact that the man at the top will perish if the family at the bottom is not in a position to purchase what the man at the top makes a profit from producing.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, the able Senator from Wyoming could not have put the matter better. From his vast knowledge of the economy of this country, which I believe to be superior to that of any of his colleagues, he knows that the prosperity of this country is based upon the purchasing power of the masses of the people. I hazard the assertion that there are many people who do not know us personally who read something we say, ofttimes garbled in a newspaper, who think that any of us who want to help the common people are either demagogs or that we have some sort of a psychopathic animosity to those people who happen to be the better-off people of America. Well, I always say, Mr. President, that I make it a rule to vote with the poor and shoot with the rich, because they have always got so much better hunting as a general rule, and not only that but they are as fine people as we have in our country.

But, Mr. President, if one wanted to befriend his wealthy friend he could not do so better than to make the masses of the people well off. There is no decent business in America that will not prosper if we have a prosperous citizenry. That is as simple as A, B, C, in the economics of the country. Yet so many fail to see it. Where will this so-called portal-to-portal money go if the workers receive it? It will go into the stores. It will go to pay house rent. It will go to buy medicine for a sick child. It will go to pay a doctor for services rendered. It will send the child to the picture show. Mr. President, it will go into the channels of commerce and trade, and once it starts flowing into those channels we know who will get the cream of it. It is those generally at the top who will get the cream.

So Mr. President, this is not a question of taking away something from somebody out of animosity or hate. It is to give the workingman what the Bible says is due him—his hire. That is the matter at issue. It is to recognize the integrity of the American judicial system. Mr. President, it is not for Congress to intervene in a domain which is not within its proper scope in a situation of this kind. It is, I believe, a matter of legislative and economic justice that we are passing upon. I shall not lend my vote to taking away from a man that which he has by the sweat of his brow justly earned and under the sanctity of the American court told is his. That is substantially the issue, Mr. President, which is involved here now.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. The distinguished Senator from Florida who has delivered a very fine speech, mentioned the fact that efforts are being made to exempt the railroads in certain cases, and efforts are being made to exempt insurance companies in certain cases. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that last year, after the Supreme Court of the United States had found that a group of producers of electrical equipment had conspired together in a war fraud case in Pittsburgh, because of which they had been assessed damages in the sum of $300,000, the Congress then abolished the so-called Abraham Lincoln informers' statute, repealing that law at a time when former Senator Van Nuys, of Indiana, who was chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, said there were war-fraud cases pending involving $1,000,000,000.

Mr. PEPPER. I thank the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. President, I will say in addition that if the Congress wants to get back some money, let us make a thorough and effective examination of many individuals who unjustly became rich and fat during the war. That will be far more justifiable than to try to take away from these workmen that which they have already justly earned by their bodily labor.

EFFECT OF FEDERAL TAX SYSTEM ON MERGERS AND MONOPOLIES

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, on March 18 Mr. Marquis Childs, one of our most distinguished columnists, writing under the caption "Drift to monopoly," paid deserved tribute to our colleague, the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] for the long and able and tireless fight he has waged against mergers, that is to say, against monopoly, which, if allowed to flourish unchecked, would lead us down the road to some form of collectivism.

In his column, after paying tribute to the Senator from Wyoming, and quoting rather extensively from him, and telling of his work, Mr. Childs calls attention to a letter which he received from a friendly manufacturer. The gist of the manufacturer's letter is to the effect that the Government's tax system, particularly the inheritance tax system, operates today in such a way as, in some instances, to force mergers and to encourage monopoly, which most of us do not wish, and which the Senator from Wyoming so vigorously has opposed. I know that the report of the Temporary National Economic Committee, of which the Senator from Wyoming was the chairman, went into the different questions of the causes for mergers and the factors that brought them about.

I should like to invite the attention of the Senator from Wyoming at this time to the column written by Mr. Childs and particularly to the letter from the manufacturer, and ask the Senator what the TNEC has to say in its report with reference to the question of the tax policy, particularly as related to inheritance taxes, and the effect on mergers and monopolies.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I am happy to respond to the Senator's request. I read the column of Mr. Marquis Childs myself with a great deal of interest and appreciation because I think it calls attention to what is really the most important question before the people of the United States. We complain about the concentration of power in Government. We can do nothing about that concentration unless we first do something about stemming the concentration of economic power in industry. All complaint about the growth of Government power is futile unless we act to make it possible for independent competitive enterprise to survive. It is dying before our eyes because of the neglect of those who claim to be its friends.

A moment ago I was listening to the eloquent speech of the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], who spoke about the profits which are now being made. The National City Bank of New York City, in its February economic letter, published a tabulation comparing the profits of approximately 850 manufacturing corporations in 1946 with their profits in 1945. The amazing fact, according to the National City Bank, is that those profits amount to 31 percent more in 1946 than they did in 1945.

I read with interest the letter from a manufacturer quoted by Mr. Childs and just now read by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL]. That manufacturer was concerned about the effect of the inheritance tax on little and local business because it frequently compels certain industries to sell out. Only the other day, on the 31st of January, on behalf of the special committee investigating petroleum resources, I filed a report in which special reference was made to precisely that point. I may be justified, in response to the Senator's question, in reading this brief paragraph which appears on page 51 of the report, Report No. 9, on the independent petroleum companies:

> The majors are corporations with thousands of stockholders of small average holdings, whereas the independents are frequently the ventures of comparatively few stockholders. Again, the major is less affected by the life expectancy of its managers or stockholders, because its executives are drawn from an ample reservoir of talent, and because its stockholders normally do not exercise executive functions. On the other hand, when the founder of a small independent dies, there is often no one among his heirs to succeed him, and the inheritance tax frequently deals such an enterprise a severe blow.

The Temporary National Economic Committee studied the question of combinations and mergers, the effect of the antitrust laws, the need of decentralization of industry, and the effect of the tax laws. The Senator will indulge me, I think, if I read a brief paragraph from the report of that committee. It appears on page 30 of Senate Document 35 of the Seventy-seventh Congress, first session, and will, I believe, answer the Senator's inquiry.

STIMULATING INVESTMENT

> The voluminous testimony before the Temporary National Economic Committee conclusively demonstrated the potential capacity of the American economy to produce an abundance of goods and services. We are committed to the purpose of making that potential capacity the actual quantity of goods and services available to the people of this Nation. We reject as un-American and unrealistic the belief that the limits of economic achievement have been reached in the United States.
> The hearings and studies of the Temporary National Economic Committee have disclosed the restraints placed on the competitive system by the concentration of economic power with respect to the disadvantages under which small independent business labors in attempting to operate successfully. Important avenues of credit for small business have either disappeared or so altered in their conditions as no longer to be readily available. Yet small business is the seedbed of a growing system of free enterprise upon which a healthy industrial economy depends. Its encouragement is essential to a dynamic economy.
> The social desirability of new enterprise and new employment is so great that Congress can well consider the advisability of material reductions in the rate of taxation on returns which come from investments in new, independent businesses.

Because we have not followed these recommendations, large concentrations of capital have a tremendous advantage over the small operator whose profits are taxed at the same rate that the profits of the huge monopolistic combinations are taxed, with the result that the small business enterprise is unable to invest its profits in necessary expansion. That contributes inevitably to magnifying the drift toward concentration.

The advantages to be derived by the whole economy from the opening of new fields to investment and commercial activity would more than offset any financial loss in returns from the higher brackets under the income-tax law.

This does not blind us to the facts developed concerning the lack of private investment sufficient to absorb in economic production the savings of our citizens during the past decade or more. Vast hoarding of unused capital has resulted. It cannot be denied that the present system of production and distribution permits the amount set aside in savings to increase at a much faster rate than the national income itself increases, causing an imbalance of serious proportions. Nor is the answer found in continued Government spending to counterbalance the accumulation of unused savings in a relatively few hands. The ultimate answer must be in such a stimulus to private enterprise that an expanding economic endeavor will immediately put all savings to work in providing the capital required for a more adequate standard of living for all our people.

No single remedy will achieve this result. Many of the recommendations offered in this report will go far, in combination, to effect it. An equitable tax system will do much. A wise program of aid to the underprivileged to increase their purchasing power will do a great deal.

Mr. HILL. That is exactly what the Senator from Florida has been talking about.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly. I continue to read from the report:

Strict enforcement of existing antitrust laws and more adequate antitrust legislation to prevent monopoly and insure a system of free competition in a free market will accomplish great things. It is an important axiom that we cannot maintain an economy of mass production unless we have an economy of mass consumption. The only practical way of preserving our democratic institutions is to pass on the benefits of our technology in lowered prices and increased standards of living to our entire population. A combination of the above remedies will remove many of the restraints and uncertainties which have retarded the investment of capital in new enterprise. They are recommended by this committee as essential in stimulating the use of capital which will adjust the imbalance between savings and investments.

I could read much more, but the gist of the report is that the Congress of the United States, if it is to preserve the free competitive system, if it is to prevent the continued growth of big business and big government, must undertake by legislation of this character to encourage and support the independent enterprises by preventing monopolistic mergers. Here we are almost at the end of March, and this Congress, instead of thinking about legislation of this character and acting upon it, is devoting its attention to ways and means of cutting taxes for the benefit of those who receive large incomes, and whose profits are immeasurably greater than they were a year ago.

We seek to hasten the enactment of legislation designed to punish the worker, instead of doing something that will aid both the worker and the small business enterprise. Mr. President, a few weeks ago I presented some facts about a bill which I introduced in the last Congress, again in this Congress, and which has been introduced in the House by Representative KEFAUVER, to amend the Clayton Act so as to prevent monopolistic mergers through the purchase of the assets of competing corporations. In my remarks I pointed out that the rate of industrial combination in this country today is five times greater than it was before the war. We are hastening fast as carelessness will permit us to go toward concentrating economic power in monopolistic mergers which will make inevitable the development of statism. The totalitarian state is the product of private economic concentration. If we wish to resist it, we must go first to the cause. The prevention of private concentration is the supreme need of our time.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. KILGORE. I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Wyoming on the subject which he has been discussing. Has it not been the observation of the Senator from Wyoming that the profit he spoke of has been based on the concentration of wealth and that there will be a complete trust system in the United States if we do not stop it?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Of course.

Mr. KILGORE. That, plus inheritance taxes, the patent pool, and the transportation pool?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The accumulation of huge profits by a small number of industrial corporations makes it impossible to invest needed capital in the development of the resources of various parts of our country. The development of every State in the Union at the present moment depends not upon local action but upon the decisions made in the counting houses of New York and Chicago, in the executive offices of big business, and in the offices of some of the savings institutions, such as insurance companies. Let me say that while the TNEC was holding its investigation on investment a representative of the New York Life Insurance Co. appeared before us to testify with respect to the investment of the savings of people accumulated by the insurance companies through the payment of premiums. I asked the president of the company whether or not they had many $50,000 loans. "Oh, no," he said. "That is much too small a sum for us to service. We would not be interested in a loan smaller than $200,000 or $250,000."

So, obviously, when the savings of the people are diverted into these huge central reservoirs of capital they do not go back to develop the little business of our country which needs them. The only way in the world to stimulate new activity in little business, decentralized business, is to take steps now to prevent the continual movement toward monopolistic mergers.

Mr. KILGORE. I should like to ask another question. That being the situation, is it not the Senator's recollection that, for instance, in connection with the sale of surplus plants, when that question was passed on in the last Congress, we cast upon the Department of Justice the task of opposing sales which tended to create monopolies and reporting to the Congress regarding the matter? One of the steps now being taken, allegedly a forward step, but really a backward step, is that we are fighting appropriations to enable that one Department, among others, to carry out the mandate of Congress to study that question and take appropriate action where necessary.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator is quite right.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. COOPER. From the tenor of the remarks which have been made by the Senator from Wyoming, is it his opinion that large and powerful business interests could assimilate portal-to-portal costs as a part of the cost of their product better than could small industries?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I say quite frankly to the Senator that large enterprises can assimilate more readily than any other industry costs of any kind; and they do.

Mr. COOPER. The imposition of such costs on small business would make even closer their margin of profit.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, as the Senator knows from the questions which I addressed to him earlier in the day I am not a member of the committee which brought this portal-to-portal bill to the floor, and I have been endeavoring this afternoon by listening and by reading the bill to come to a conclusion as to what is best to do. I will say to the Senator that I find as I have listened and as I have read that those who are defending this bill talk in terms of theory, but they have brought before the Senate a bill which would, in my opinion, have an effect quite the reverse of that which they intend to obtain.

I rose merely to answer a question directed to me by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] on another subject, and I am afraid that I am so interested in the subject that I took more time than I intended.

Mr. COOPER. My question was in response to the Senator's answer that large corporations and large businesses could better assimilate portal-to-portal costs than could smaller business concerns. If that be true, would not that accelerate the very monopolistic concentration about which the Senator has been speaking?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I will say to the Senator that the passage of the pending bill will not, in my opinion, do little business a penny's worth of good.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Wyoming that he not only ably answered the question, but he made a very real contribution in doing so. He spoke with authority, as he always does.

Mr. President, I ask that at this point there may be printed in the RECORD the article by Mr. Marquis Childs to which I referred in my inquiry of the Senator from Wyoming.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON CALLING

(By Marquis Childs)

DRIFT TO MONOPOLY

Senator JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY, of Wyoming, is one of the most sincere, fair-minded, dispassionate men in Congress. Yet he finds himself month after month crying out a warning that no one seems to listen to.

A reasonable man himself, Senator O'MAHONEY thinks that the lawmakers and the American people should pay attention to what is to him so very dear. Put in the simplest language, what O'MAHONEY is saying over and over again is this:

The big corporations are gobbling up the little corporations. That process is going on today faster than at any time since the depression year of 1931. The rate at which mergers are occurring is five times that of 1939. The giant corporations now have economic power far greater than all but a few States. The end will be four or five colossal corporations and they will be taken over and run by the Government.

It is this threat of Government control at the end of the monopoly road which is the theme of O'MAHONEY'S warning. He doesn't want State control. He knows that State control is likely to mean the end of all our freedoms. But he sees that statism is certain unless we stop the business of merger and monopoly.

The other day O'MAHONEY introduced a bill he believes will be a remedy. It is an amendment to the Clayton Antitrust Act, which now permits mergers that merge the assets of corporations while forbidding mergers that are merely stock mergers. This is, of course, a loophole big enough to accommodate any kind of merger that a clever set of lawyers want to engineer. O'MAHONEY'S amendment would forbid merger by asset as well as merger by stock.

He has another remedy he has frequently advocated. That is Federal licensing for corporations to make them responsible to the only unit of Government that could contain the giants which sprawl out across State lines and over international boundaries.

Now and then JOE O'MAHONEY gets a little discouraged. He wonders why it is so hard to get people to pay any attention to this drift toward collectivism. In a speech sometime ago, he pointed out that the tendency in industry is inequitably paralleled by the same trend in government. Before the Eightieth Congress was a month old, he pointed out, 30 bills had been introduced increasing the powers of the Federal Government, and they were sponsored by both Republicans and Democrats. It was a Republican, Representative EVERETT DIRKSEN, of Illinois, who introduced a bill creating an office of power administration in Washington.

This column, too, has tried from time to time to point out where monopoly concentration is heading. A recent column recited the troubles of a middle western manufacturer who was fearful that, with high income and inheritance taxes, he or his heirs would be forced to sell the family business.

In a friendly letter, the manufacturer has pointed to what he felt was an oversight in that column. It was not, he wrote, merely a matter of control of the industry by a big corporation or by the family that has owned it and operated it in one community for 40 years.

"My point," he wrote, "is that it could be extremely adverse to everybody who works in the plant and to the entire organization from top to bottom. It could also cause a loss to the community in which we are located, because a forced sale of that kind to pay inheritance taxes could easily mean consolidation of the plant with some other units of a company in an entirely different city, and it might very well mean that the organization that has been here for many years would not be needed in such a new set-up?"

That point is very well taken. It is exactly what happens in merger after merger.

The Federal Trade Commission just published a report showing that 1,800 companies have been merged with larger companies since 1940. They had a value of $4,100,000,000, which is 5 percent of the total value of all manufacturing corporations. Senator O'MAHONEY goes on uttering his warning and most of us go on our all too indifferent way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], for himself and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. MCGRATH], to the committee amendment.

Mr. WHITE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hayden	Murray
Baldwin	Hickenlooper	Myers
Ball	Hill	O'Conor
Barkley	Hoey	O'Daniel
Bricker	Holland	O'Mahoney
Bridges	Ives	Pepper
Brooks	Jenner	Reed
Buck	Johnson, Colo.	Robertson, Va.
Bushfield	Johnston, S.C.	Russell
Byrd	Kem	Smith
Cain	Kilgore	Sparkman
Capper	Knowland	Stewart
Chavez	Langer	Taft
Connally	Lodge	Taylor
Cooper	Lucas	Thomas, Okla.
Donnell	McCarran	Thomas, Utah
Downey	McCarthy	Thye
Dworshak	McClellan	Tobey
Eastland	McFarland	Umstead
Ecton	McGrath	Vandenberg
Ellender	McKellar	Watkins
Ferguson	McMahon	Wherry
Flanders	Magnuson	White
Fulbright	Malone	Wiley
George	Martin	Williams
Green	Maybank	Wilson
Gurney	Millikin	Young
Hatch	Moore
Hawkes	Morse

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I asked that the presence of a quorum might be established in order that I might make a unanimous-consent request.

I ask unanimous consent that on the calendar day of Friday, March 21, 1947, at not later than the hour of 3 o'clock p. m., the Senate proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment or motion that may be pending or that may be proposed to the committee substitute, and upon the committee substitute for the pending bill H. R. 2157.

I also request that on said day—that is, tomorrow, at not later than 5 o'clock p. m.—the Senate proceed to vote upon the final passage of the bill itself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine submits a unanimous-consent request, which he has read. Under the rule a quorum call is required after the presentation of such a unanimous-consent request, but, in view of the call of the quorum previously, without objection, it will be considered that the rule is complied with.

Mr. MCCARRAN. Mr. President, merely to clear the atmosphere with reference to the proposed unanimous-consent request, when the Senator says vote "on the bill," does that mean the bill reported by the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. WHITE. That is the bill that is pending before us.

Mr. MCCARRAN. My reason for asking the question is that there might be pending what is known as the Gwynne bill. The Gwynne bill is in the atmosphere, and I do not know what place it may take during the deliberations. I merely ask the question conjecturally.

Mr. WHITE. As I understand, we have all the while been considering H. R. 2157. That, I take it, is the bill that is referred to in the request.

Mr. MCCARRAN. That is the Gwynne bill; that is, the House bill.

Mr. WHITE. Yes.

Mr. MCCARRAN. That was amended in the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WHITE. Yes.

Mr. MCCARRAN. The bill reported by the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary is an amendment to the House bill.

Mr. WHITE. I think the House bill as amended is the bill that is before the Senate.

Mr. MCCARRAN. That is correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the Senator from Nevada will yield, there is pending the committee amendment to the House bill, which will have to be voted on as an amendment before the bill can be voted on as amended. I contemplate that that is what the Senator from Maine had in mind—that there would be a final vote on whatever bill may be finally completed.

Mr. WHITE. Whatever bill may be finally completed in the legislative process is what we will finally vote upon.

Mr. MCCARRAN. I merely ask these questions to clarify the situation. If, however, in the course of the deliberations the amendment proposed by the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary should not prevail, then the Gwynne bill would be before the Senate.

Mr. WHITE. I think that is correct.

Mr. MCCARRAN. In that event, I do not believe we would care to enter into a unanimous-consent agreement, because the Gwynne bill as such has never been debated before the Senate, excepting as I may have discussed it yesterday to a very slight extent. All I want to do is to clear the atmosphere. I want to join in the unanimous-consent agreement, but I do not want the parliamentary situation to be such that we would have to vote on the Gwynne bill. If it were a straight-out vote on the Gwynne bill, I would not want to vote on it tomorrow, because, to my mind, the Gwynne bill is worse than the amendment in the nature of a substitute which is now before the Senate.

Mr. WHITE. I do not know of anything further in the way of explanation I can offer. What we will finally vote upon, and what the unanimous-consent agreement suggested has in view, is the bill in the final form in which it will come before us after the substitute offered by the Senator from Nevada shall have been disposed of and after the committee amendment shall have been disposed of. In whatever form the bill may then be, that is the form upon which the final vote will come.

Mr. McCARRAN. Very well; but I desire to reserve the right, and will consent to the unanimous-consent agreement with this proviso: That should the committee amendment to the Gwynne bill, by any peculiar movement in legislation, be dropped out of the bill, and the Gwynne bill be before the Senate, I do not propose to agree to limit debate on that. I do not know whether it could come about or not, but I am anticipating something which might happen.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, if I may address a question to the Senator from Maine, as I understand, the proposed agreement contemplates a vote only upon amendments now pending.

Mr. WHITE. Oh, no. Let me read the proposal again:

> I ask unanimous consent that on Friday * * * the Senate proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment or motion that may be pending or that may be proposed to the committee substitute, and upon the committee substitute for the pending bill.

That refers to H. R. 2157, in whatever form it may be when the voting stage is reached.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. If the unanimous-consent agreement is merely to vote upon amendments or motions which may be pending at the hour designated, then it seems to me to meet the question raised by the Senator from Nevada, because clearly, as the Senator has just now read the consent agreement, it does not call for a vote upon the final passage of the bill.

Mr. WHERRY. That is what the agreement is.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. If the Senator would withdraw the request and ask for unanimous consent to vote upon all pending amendments to the bill by 3 o'clock, I think there probably would be no difficulty.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I am sure the majority leader means to say that what the unanimous-consent agreement provides is that a vote shall be taken upon the committee substitute at not later than 3 o'clock tomorrow afternoon, or on any amendments or motions thereto, and that at 5 o'clock the vote shall be taken on the final passage of the bill. That, I am sure, was the intention of the majority leader, and if we could get that agreement, we would like to have it.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I suggest that if the Senator from Nebraska would permit the majority leader to state his own meaning, we would all be much better informed.

Mr. WHITE. The majority leader stated his meaning in the language of the unanimous-consent request prepared by the Parliamentarian as an aid to him in presenting the request. I think the language speaks for itself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I do not wish to be put in the position of objecting, and perhaps my apprehension is unfounded, but the majority leader uses the term "the bill," and the bill has been amended by the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, and it is the amendment which comes from the majority of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary that is to be voted on by 5 o'clock.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, there is some substance to the Senator's observation, undoubtedly. If it should transpire, which is unlikely, that all amendments would be voted down, including the committee amendment, and we were confronted with the proposition of voting on the Gwynne bill just raw—and it would be raw—certainly we would not want to put ourselves in the position of being compelled to vote on that bill without any discussion. I have a feeling that if such a situation should develop, and all amendments should be defeated, including the committee amendment, the Senate itself would want to abrogate the agreement to vote at 5 o'clock. However, I do not think there is any danger to be run in agreeing to the limitation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HATCH. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Mexico objects.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], on behalf of himself and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. McGRATH].

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I had some part in trying to arrange an agreement to vote at a certain hour tomorrow. I am frank to say that to some extent a personal equation entered into it, because I wanted to discuss very briefly the McCarran amendment. For reasons which I need not explain, but which Senators understand, I arrived in the city only today, and I have not had an opportunity to read or to study either the committee bill or the McCarran amendment or the report on either. I do not wish to be forced to take the floor now to try to discuss either one of those matters, or the whole subject, without the overnight preparation which I feel to be necessary.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, we all appreciate the circumstances which lead to the present situation of the Senator from Kentucky. I think it is an entirely reasonable request he makes, that he should have an opportunity between now and tomorrow to study the measure and to prepare to speak, if he desires to do so.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I think that if the Senator from Maine were to renew his request for a vote at a certain hour tomorrow there would now be no objection.

Mr. WHITE. I renew the request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine renews his request. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, would the majority leader be kind enough to inform me and inform the Senate whether it is his intention to bring up, immediately following the vote, the Lilienthal nomination?

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, it has been the understanding that, upon the disposition of the pending matter, the Lilienthal and related nominations would be the subject of discussion and action. That program is, I believe, in effect at this time.

Mr. McMAHON. Is there any intention, I ask the majority leader, to start that debate on Saturday, or is it to go over until Monday?

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, if I have an opportunity to do so, I shall very shortly move that the Senate stand in recess until tomorrow. Whether there will be a session on Saturday is a matter of doubt. I hope that we can make progress with the Lilienthal and related nominations speedily. I do not like to say that the Senate will be in session on Saturday; I rather cherish the hope that a session on Saturday will not be required, but there will be a session tomorrow.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHITE. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. If the Senator from Connecticut wants assurance that the Lilienthal nomination will not be taken up for consideration before Monday, that can be given, because there are two or three measures facing deadlines which will have to be acted on, though perhaps they can be disposed of quickly. I refer to sugar control, rubber control, the international refugee situation, and so forth.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I was hoping that the Senate could begin considering the Lilienthal nomination as quickly as possible, but as between Friday or Saturday and Monday, it does not make too much difference when it is taken up. I hope we can begin debate on the Lilienthal nomination on Monday.

Mr. TAFT. It is also my hope that we can begin debate on the nomination on Monday.

Mr. GURNEY. Mr. President, I heard the statements made by the Senator from Connecticut and the Senator from Ohio, but I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the selective service law will expire on March 31. If the Senate in executive session embarks on a debate on the Lilienthal nomination it will undoubtedly proceed for a considerable length of time, and I call attention to the fact that there is another very important matter which must be taken care of before the first of the month. It must be passed upon by both Houses.

Mr. TAFT. May I ask what it is?

Mr. GURNEY. The establishment of a Selective Service Records Board to take care of 6,400 local boards where the selective service records are kept.

Mr. TAFT. Is there any reason for thinking that that matter will arouse very much controversy?

Mr. GURNEY. Oh, I think it can be passed in a short time. I do not see how there can be any objection to it. Probably it would not take more than 30 minutes to explain it.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I have indicated that I cannot give a definite answer as to whether the Senate will be in session on Saturday, but I think we should sit tomorrow and proceed to the conclusion of the pending measure, if that is possible.

I therefore move that the Senate stand in recess until tomorrow at 12 o'clock noon.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his motion for a moment?

Mr. WHITE. If I can withdraw the motion, I do so.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WHITE. I yield.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. So that there may be no misunderstanding, Mr. President, I wish to announce that immediately upon the conclusion of the vote on final passage of the pending unfinished business, I shall ask that the question of the confirmation of the nominees to the Atomic Energy Commission, the General Manager, and members thereof, be made the order of business for consideration by the Senate under whatever terms it may please the Senate, but I should like then to proceed, with reasonable interruption if necessary, along that line. I do not want any silence on my part to indicate acquiescence in any other line of procedure.

RECESS

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I renew my motion that the Senate now stand in recess until tomorrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 17 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Friday, March 21, 1947, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATION

Executive nomination received by the Senate March 20 (legislative day of February 19), 1947:

COLLECTOR OF INTERNAL REVENUE

James M. Alsup, of Honolulu, T. H., to be collector of internal revenue for the district of Hawaii, to fill an existing vacancy.

WITHDRAWAL

Executive nomination withdrawn from the Senate March 20 (legislative day of February 19), 1947:

COLLECTOR OF INTERNAL REVENUE

Herbert E. Arnold to be collector of internal revenue for the district of Texas.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, MARCH 20, 1947

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, in this sacred hour we praise Thee that Thy boundless mercy is the sunlight of our existence, and Thy love which mantles through its folds can never perish. We give Thee thanks, O Lord, for the open door of Thy blessings, for the heritage of home and church and school, for the character they mold, which is destiny.

O Thou who dost bestow Thy loving kindness in the daytime and Thy song in the night, keep before us the responsibilities which our duties impose. As we begin our labors, O double our diligence and give strength and courage to our arm, that we may break any spell of lesser loyalties, ignoring every fragmentary impulse and vagrant ambition that hinders the sovereignty of right. In the midst of all that perplexes and saddens, we are humbly grateful to live in this day, to take our place and sound the voice that heralds the advent of a new era for our country and the world.

"America, America, God mend thine every flaw, Confirm thy soul in self-control, thy liberty in law."

In our dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, March 18, 1947, was read and approved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that on the following dates the President approved and signed bills of the House of the following titles:

On March 10, 1947:

H. R. 1040. An act to authorize the payment of $425.88 by the United States to the Government of Switzerland;

H. R. 1778. An act to amend the Federal Firearms Act; and

H. R. 2045. An act to amend the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act of June 25, 1938, as amended, by providing for the certification of batches of drugs composed wholly or partly of any kind of streptomycin, or any derivatives thereof, and for other purposes.

On March 11, 1947:

H. R. 1030. An act to continue in effect certain war excise tax rates, and for other purposes.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. J. Res. 27. Joint resolution amending the Settlement of Mexican Claims Act of 1942 to provide for the consideration of any claim decided by the General Claims Commission in which the United States filed a petition for rehearing.

The message also announced that the President pro tempore has appointed Mr. LANGER and Mr. CHAVEZ members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of August 5, 1939, entitled "An act to provide for the disposition of certain records of the United States Government," for the disposition of executive papers in the following departments and agencies:

1. Department of Agriculture.
2. Department of Labor.
3. Department of the Navy.
4. Department of the Treasury.
5. Department of War.
6. Federal Security Agency.
7. Federal Works Agency.
8. General Accounting Office.
9. Railroad Retirement Board.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the transcript of a speech delivered by President Roxas in Manila on March 7, 1947. I have an estimate from the Public Printer that the speech, together with a clipping I desire to insert, will cost about $355. Notwithstanding this fact, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include therein the speech by President Roxas, together with the clipping I mentioned.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLAND (at the request of Mr. DREWRY) was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a speech by Hon. John L. Sullivan, Under Secretary of the Navy, at the launching of the cruiser Newport News.

Mr. RUSSELL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include a statement by John A. Church.

Mr. KEATING asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an editorial comment by Arthur Krock in yesterday's New York Times.

Mr. MILLER of Maryland asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MATHEWS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a statement made by certain employees in an industrial plant in his district.

Mr. VAN ZANDT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in connection with a correction of the list of war veterans of the Eightieth Congress.

Mr. CANFIELD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include two editorials.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include certain recommendations by the League for the American Home. I am convinced that this will exceed the authorized limit, but I ask that it be printed notwithstanding that fact.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, notwithstanding the cost, the extension may be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. KEFAUVER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include excerpts from a letter.

Mr. LANE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in three instances; to include in one an address delivered by the Rt. Rev. Msgr. Fulton J. Sheen; in one to include an article appearing in the Christian Science Monitor; and in the other to extend his remarks on a bill he is filing today.

Mr. ROBERTSON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article appearing in the New York Times.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances; to include in one an editorial appearing in a New Jersey newspaper, and in the other a short poem appearing in a New Jersey newspaper.

Mr. LATHAM asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and to include newspaper articles in each.

Mr. HAYS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. THOMAS of Texas asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a letter.

Mr. EVINS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article by Commander James G. Stahlman appearing in the National Banner on March 17 under the heading "From the Shoulder."

SPECIAL ORDERS TRANSFERRED

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have vacated the 30-minute special order granted me this afternoon and reserve it for next Thursday afternoon, following any special orders heretofore entered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, by unanimous consent, a special order was granted me for 1 hour. I would like to renew that request because I was not able to use it, so I ask unanimous consent that following any special orders heretofore entered I may be permitted to address the House for 1 hour today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Tuesday next, at the conclusion of the legislative program of the day and following any special orders heretofore entered, I may be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

"PLEASE, GOD, SILENCE THE SCHEMING AND THE STUPID"

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday the newspapers carried a statement that the body of a prominent citizen of this city was found on a golf course in the District.

According to the authorities, death was caused by the victim's own hand. His associates recall that he had been deeply affected by the death of his only son who had been killed in action in Italy on April 30, 1945.

A death on the battlefield leaves more than one corpse. One is the mangled body of a soldier, and the others, the crushed and broken hearts of a mother and father.

Under the glass top of the desk in his office the father kept a prayer taken from his son's diary, reading:

Please, God, silence the scheming and the stupid in our Government and let the honest and the strong lead us to light.

Otherwise, we fight in vain. If we cannot correct ourselves, how can we lead others from their chaos?

This prayer was from a boy, Morgan J. Quinn, 22 years of age, a graduate of Notre Dame University.

Today, our hearts and sympathy go out to a wife and mother who is stricken with grief.

It is always good to pray but at this hour this prayer has a special significance, and I would like to repeat it again:

Please, God, silence the scheming and the stupid in our Government and let the honest and the strong lead us to light.

Otherwise, we fight in vain. If we cannot correct ourselves, how can we lead others from their chaos?

And I will add:

"Please, God, deliver us from the stupidity and scheming of those in our Government who would again engulf the world in war."

THE WILLIAM P. CONNERY, JUNIOR, MEMORIAL HOSPITAL

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, many of you in this session of the Congress fondly remember that dynamic figure with the keen mind and brilliant wit, my predecessor in office from the Seventh Massachusetts District, the late Honorable William P. Connery, Jr.

In the long and successful period during which he served as a Member of this House, from 1923 until 1937, Billy Connery, as he was affectionately known, was outstanding in his service to the veterans. Consistently, from his first term till his last, when, worn out by his labors, he was suddenly taken from us, Billy Connery was a member of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation. His aggressive interest in their behalf is reflected in the numerous bills he introduced which later became law.

Although it is not the customary procedure to do so, I believe that in this case we should make an exception and dedicate a veterans' hospital to his name. Billy Connery was a veteran in war, promoted for meritorious service on the field of battle with the Twenty-sixth "Yankee" Division in World War I. He was also a veteran in peace, fighting with all the resources of his heart and mind to see that a grateful Nation did not forget its disabled fighting men.

Billy Connery was worn out by that struggle at the age of 49.

To perpetuate the memory of his high character of service in behalf of our ex-soldiers and sailors, I have introduced a bill to name the Veterans' Administration facility at West Roxbury, Mass., the William P. Connery, Junior, Memorial Veterans' Hospital.

This is the largest hospital of its kind in Massachusetts. For many years to come it will be ministering to the needs of those who were broken in the fight to save all that we hold dear.

It is, therefore, appropriate for this House to approve the bill which will dedicate this hospital to the memory of William P. Connery, Jr., the veterans' comrade, friend, and champion.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LARCADE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and in each include copies of editorials and newspaper articles.

Mr. ALBERT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a copy of a bill he introduced.

Mr. GARY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial from the Richmond News-Leader.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a letter from Senator Callan, chairman of the committee on the budget of the Nebraska Legislature.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD by inserting an interesting and historic item on my famous city of New Bedford.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McDONOUGH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a resolution adopted by the Board of Supervisors of Los Angeles County.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include an analysis I have made of the five alternatives now confronting America at this cross road in the history of our foreign policy.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

HAVE WE NOT HAD ENOUGH OF WAR?

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Speaker, in some instances we were forced into it, but nevertheless, the record is: We have warred with Germany and Japan, with England and with Spain, with Mexico and with the Indians, and we have even warred among ourselves during the Civil War. Have not we had enough of war?

Cannot we realize that our school system is about to break down; that our old-age-assistance program is in a deplorable condition; that our public debt is almost too heavy to bear?

Let us not send any troops to Greece and Turkey. Let us rededicate ourselves to the United Nations. Let us get down to the proposition of trying to make democracy work in this country.

I wonder what the other nations of the world are thinking of us? "Oh, would some power the gift give us to see ourselves as others see us. It would from many a blunder free us and foolish notion."

SUGAR SUPPLY

Mr. JONKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONKMAN. Mr. Speaker, a telegram was relayed to me this morning from Bache & Co., dated March 14, 1947:

PREDICT LARGER 1947 CUBAN SUGAR CROP

HABANA.—In view of conflicting reports regarding the size of the present crop, the Cuban sugar exporting firms have made a survey and have received answers from over 97 percent of producers. This has resulted in a new estimate of 6,137,000 short tons against 1946 production of 4,475,829 short tons.

After deducting the 738,000 short tons destined for local consumption and other countries, it leaves an excess of about 650,000 short tons over and above the 4,752,000 which the International Emergency Food Council allocated as the probable Cuban 1947 supply.

BACHE & CO.

I think the sugar agencies had better get busy and increase the rations for sugar, because it will not be very long before we will be in another canning season and the people need this sugar to use for canning. If I remember correctly, the IEFC allotted 3,150,000 tons of Cuban sugar to the United States a few months ago. OPA has already intimated that this would increase the sugar ration for household use but not for canning. This windfall of 650,000 tons will allow a substantial ration to the long-suffering housewives for that purpose. OPA or its successors should not go to sleep with this sugar in warehouses, or they will hear from these women next fall.

WORDS SPOKEN IN DEBATE

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, on last Monday when I was off the floor the Member from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] attacked me on this floor in the most stupid, asinine, and false statement I have ever seen inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I had made a speech in which I had pointed out——

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman is not in order when he attacks me and charges that I falsely quoted him. I have followed closely what the gentleman has said on the floor and regretted that such things should have been said by him.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. RANKIN. May I be heard on the point of order? I think the question ought to be settled at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. RANKIN. When a man gets on the floor and makes a false statement it is in order for another Member to denounce it as false. We had this matter before the House once, in a row between Mr. James F. Byrnes, of South Carolina, and Mr. Fordney, of Michigan. One of them had said the other one had made a false statement. At that time we had in the House a great parliamentary authority, the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Mann, the best parliamentarian I ever saw. He pointed out that it was in order to denounce as false an untrue statement made by another Member.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. RANKIN. I am talking on the point of order.

Mr. SABATH. There is nothing in the RECORD that I said that the gentleman has made a false statement. I deny that statement.

Mr. RANKIN. He made the false statement himself in his attack on me.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and eighteen Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 22]

Allen, Calif.	Gerlach	Morrison
Allen, Ill.	Gregory	Norton
Bates, Mass.	Hartley	O'Toole
Bland	Hendricks	Patman
Bradley, Mich.	Holifield	Peterson
Buckley	Hull	Pfeifer
Bulwinkle	Johnson, Calif.	Powell
Byrne, N. Y.	Johnson, Tex.	Rabin
Celler	Kelley	Rayfiel
Clements	Keogh	Short
Cravens	Kilday	Simpson, Pa.
Crawford	Kirwan	Sundstrom
Curtis	Landis	Taber
Dawson, Ill.	Macy	Taylor
Dondero	Mahon	Vail
Feighan	Mansfield, Tex.	Vinson
Fletcher	Marcantonio	Vursell
Fuller	Mason	Wigglesworth
Gallagher	Meade, Ky.

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 373 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

By unanimous consent, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

WORDS SPOKEN IN DEBATE

The SPEAKER. At the time the point of order of no quorum was made the gentleman from Mississippi was addressing the House. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, on last Monday, March 17, I made a 1-minute speech on the floor of the House, and I am going to read that 1-minute speech as a preliminary to my remarks:

A CHALLENGE TO COMMUNISM

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, if we are going to challenge the spread of communism in Greece and Turkey, we had better make it a full-dress affair and challenge it all along the line beginning here on Capitol Hill.

We should begin in the House Office Building, the Senate Office Building, the Supreme Court Building, and the Library of Congress, and go on down to the War Department and the Navy Department, and all other branches of this Government—and especially the Justice Department, where a certain bunch of Reds or "pinks" have spent years persecuting the white gentiles of this country—and especially the white people of the Southern States.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, if we are going to challenge communism in Europe, let us go to western Europe and start in Poland and Germany, and put a stop to certain elements persecuting those people who are now unable to defend themselves. Let us make peace with the German people and line them up on our side, if we are going into this battle royal throughout the world.

Then we will have a force that can help us if the worst comes to the worst and we have to sustain our contention at the point of the bayonet.

At that point the gavel fell.

Mr. Speaker, you will note in that 1-minute speech I merely mentioned the German people. I thought all intelligent people knew that Hitler was dead and his military machine shot to pieces.

But later in the day when I was not on the floor the Member from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] arose and, according to the RECORD, some of which was written in with pencil, he attacked me in a manner that violates every rule that I know. And, as I said a while ago, he made false statements that I cannot let go into the RECORD without my protest.

He is quoted as saying:

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] has let the cat out of the bag when today on this floor he proposed that we join with the German Nazis to destroy communism and all the Communists the world over.

Everybody knows I never made any such statement.

He goes on to say:

I always suspected that he followed the teachings of Hitler, and that his views and his Red scares were identical with these Nazis who cost the world 20,000,000 lives and such suffering and agony and destruction as many generations shall not erase. Today's statement confirms my suspicion.

Mr. Speaker, if a man can make a more insulting, false statement about another Member on the floor of this House, I do not know how it could be done.

He goes on to attack me further and to attack the Committee on Un-American Activities because we have striven for years to turn the pitiless sunlight of merciless publicity on the subversive elements of this country who are trying to destroy America and American institutions.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. No; I will not.

No, Mr. Speaker, just such stuff as that, just such statements as that about Members of Congress attacking their integrity and their patriotism, poured into this RECORD by men who would not dare face you on the street and make such a statement, is an insult to this House and ought to be stricken from the RECORD.

Mr. Speaker, I make that as my point of personal privilege. If it is not in order, I shall not take up the time of the House with any motion today.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule. The gentleman has not stated a question of personal privilege. The rules provide that strictures in debate do not give rise to a question of privilege, but are properly contravened by a demand that the words be taken down.

It is too late to make the demand that the words in question be taken down after business has intervened. It is plainly indicated that what transpired was in debate and the remedy of the gentleman from Mississippi at that time was to demand that the words be taken down.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] has 45 seconds remaining under permission granted him to address the House for 1 minute.

Mr. RANKIN. This stuff in the RECORD is not only false and loathsome but look what he says:

> I know that you will not be misled by the gentleman's ambitions to join forces with our enemies simply for the purpose of accomplishing the annihilation of some people who are opposed to unfair, dishonest, unrepresentative, yes, crooked government and corrupt imperialistic regimes.

He would have you believe the Communists are opposed to "corrupt imperialistic regimes." That is what they call the United States.

I presume he is also referring to the British Empire and to the Greek Empire.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot say what I want to say because I would violate the rules of the House—but I would like to say what every decent man in the House thinks—for a man to get on the floor and make that kind of a statement which does not have a word of truth in it, but which is as false a statement as can be made, and let it stay in the RECORD, the time may come when we may have to expel such Members for that kind of practice.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday next, after the disposition of business on the Speaker's desk and the conclusion of special orders heretofore granted, I may address the House for 30 minutes to discuss the President's message.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Public Lands be permitted to sit this afternoon during general debate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. DINGELL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD with regard to the arrest of the 18 American merchant seamen in Palestine.

Mr. McCORMACK asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a radio speech recently made by the Prime Minister of Eire.

Mr. McGARVEY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a resolution of the Philadelphia Archdiocesan Holy Name Union on March 2, 1947.

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Mr. EATON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Foreign Affairs may meet this afternoon for a few minutes during general debate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. COLE of New York asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a letter he received from a constituent.

SPECIAL ORDER VACATED

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a special order granted to me for today be vacated.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

REFERENCE OF A RESOLUTION

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from further consideration of House Resolution 99 and that the same be rereferred to the Committee on Un-American Activities.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the legislative business and any other special orders today I may address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the legislative business and any other special orders tomorrow I may address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. KERSTEN of Wisconsin (at the request of Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin) was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include certain extraneous matter.

Mr. BENDER asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. SADLAK asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mrs. SMITH of Maine asked and was granted permission to extend her remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial from the Hartford Courant.

Mrs. DOUGLAS asked and was granted permission to extend her remarks in the RECORD in five instances and include certain excerpts.

Mr. PRICE of Illinois asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a certain letter.

Mr. DINGELL asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a brief letter appearing in the Washington Star of March 7.

Mr. MURDOCK asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD on pending legislation.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES — CONTROL OF EXPORTS (S. DOC. NO. 19)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States which was read by the Clerk and referred to the Committee on Armed Services and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

In my message to the Congress on January 31, 1947, concerning the extension of specified parts of the Second War Powers Act, I stated that it was desirable to delay any communication on the subject of the control of this country's exports until it became clear whether or not an extension of such controls would be necessary beyond June 30, 1947.

Further review of domestic and world supplies has now convinced me that this Government must continue its control over the export of products in critically short supply here and abroad, in order to protect the economy of the United States as well as to discharge our international responsibilities. The situation, although essentially temporary in character, will certainly remain acute for some time to come.

As a result of the war many nations have been stripped of essential supplies and their productive capacity has been curtailed. Foreign demands for these supplies are therefore extremely large. Prices of many commodities in other countries are far above present levels in the United States. Uncontrolled exports of food products would result in a marked increase in the already substantial burden of living costs borne by the American people. Unlimited export of feeds, seeds, and fertilizers would make extremely difficult the achievement of the food-production goals which we have asked American farmers to meet and would increase the cost of production of farm products.

This country is the great undamaged center of industrial production to which the whole world looks for materials of every kind. Our steel, lumber, building materials, industrial chemicals and many other basic industrial commodities are sought throughout the world. Shortages of many of these commodities restrict our own domestic production of other essential products. Unrestricted export would inevitably limit the level of our own industrial production and employment. Furthermore, there are instances in which we wish to direct exports to those countries which produce commodities essential to our own economy. Thus, limited amounts of equipment have been directed to certain countries to increase the production of tin, hard fibers, sugar, and fats and oils.

Serious as would be the effect of unlimited and completely undirected exports upon a nation still troubled by many shortages, our domestic problems are not the only ones which lead me to urge upon the Congress a further extension of export controls. The United States has become a nation with world-wide responsibilities. During a period of world shortages, the distribution of this country's exports has serious international significance. If we retain the ability to channel commercial exports of critically scarce materials, we can permit export of these products to countries whose need is greatest while still protecting the United States from excessive export drains. Our international responsibilities cannot be fulfilled without this machinery. In its absence, foreign purchasing would tend to be concentrated on those commodities in greatest world shortage. Not only would our domestic supply and price structure be seriously affected, but the commodities would go to destinations where the need is comparatively less pressing.

Furthermore, we have granted loans and other monetary aid to nations whose existence must be preserved. These loans will accomplish their purpose only if the recipient nations are able to obtain critically needed supplies from this country. Export control is an important instrument in carrying out the purpose of these loan programs.

The record clearly shows that this authority over exports has been exercised in the past only with respect to those commodities in critically short supply and that, as rapidly as the supply situation has improved, commodities have been removed from control. The list of items subject to export control has been reduced from a wartime peak of over 3,000 to approximately 725 on October 1, 1946, and approximately 500 at the present time. We will continue to remove export controls as rapidly as the supply situation permits. I look forward to the day when the United States and other countries can remove these interferences to the free flow of commodities in world trade. But the danger of immediate and complete decontrol in the face of continuing domestic and world scarcities is too great for this Nation to undertake at this time.

I, therefore, recommended that the authority derived from the Export Control Act be extended for a period of one year beyond its present expiration date, June 30, 1947. It is essential that this extension be made well in advance of this date. Delay would prove unsettling to business and would handicap the planning and execution of our food and other export programs. Effective administration of the export control orders requires the assurance of continuity in operations. I urge upon the Congress prompt action in extending this authority.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—ANNUAL REPORT OF THE GOVERNOR OF THE PANAMA CANAL

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith, for the information of the Congress, the Annual Report of the Governor of the Panama Canal for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1946.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 20, 1947.

PROCUREMENT OF SUPPLIES AND SERVICES BY THE WAR AND NAVY DEPARTMENTS

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 146 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1366) to facilitate procurement of supplies and services by the War and Navy Departments, and for other purposes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall not exceed 3 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the Chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Armed Services, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment, the committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois on the rule and yield myself such time as I may require.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado is recognized.

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Speaker, the adoption of House Resolution 146 will make in order the consideration of H. R. 1366, which is a bill to facilitate the procurement of supplies and services by the War and Navy Departments, and for other purposes. This is an open rule providing for 3 hours of general debate, to be confined to the bill, the time to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Armed Services.

Mr. Speaker, this is a very important measure. It involves the procedure for spending hundreds of millions of dollars each year by the War and Navy Departments.

The bill made in order by this rule provides for a uniform purchase authority for the Army and Navy, and further provides that the War and Navy Departments shall make all purchases of supplies and services on the basis of competitive bids except in certain instances where this method would not be to the best interest of the Government or the public. Exceptions to the advertising-competitor bid method are specifically set forth in the bill.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to be frank and honest with the House and must state that this bill was not reported out of the Rules Committee unanimously. During the presentation of the bill before our committee there was some criticism of this legislation, and the fear was expressed that possibly Congress was going too far in continuing some of these emergency powers of the Army and Navy. We were assured, however, that this measure will bring about more efficiency in the procurement of our supplies, and will result in great savings to the taxpayers of this country.

The bill, H. R. 1366, continues and extends into our peacetime economy certain powers and authority which were granted the War Department and Navy Department during the period of the war and which expedite the procurement of supplies during that period. This bill revises the procedure for the purchase of supplies amounting to huge sums each year. I mention this so that the House may be fully advised of the importance of the measure you are about to consider.

This bill would also give small-business concerns a fair opportunity to sell to the armed services by providing that supplies and services should be bought in reasonably small lots by the Army and Navy. Not only does this provision help small business, but it also helps the Government. There is definitely greater security in a national emergency to have a larger number of small suppliers, spread over a wide geographical area, than to rely upon a few large suppliers in concentrated centers. By allowing a larger number of small businessmen in all parts of the country to sell to the services, the Army and Navy will become acquainted with the abilities of small producers and will grow more and more to rely upon them for an increasing amount of their supplies. This provision will also give small businessmen an opportunity to learn the procedure by which the Government purchases its requirement.

This measure has the support of the War and the Navy Departments, and it was unanimously reported by the Committee on Armed Services. The bill is rather technical in nature, as it affects so much existing legislation regarding procurement procedure.

I understand this legislation has the full support of both the Army and Navy and comes to the House with the unanimous approval of the Committee on Armed Services.

I will not enter into a further discussion of the bill at this time. The chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Armed Services, which handled this bill, the gentleman from California [Mr. ANDERSON], will explain the measure in detail, and I am sure other members of the committee will give the House full and complete information concerning this measure and the reasons why it should be passed at this time.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

WILL NOT DIGNIFY ATTACKS BY ANSWER—RULE ON SUPPLY BILL

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to take up the time of the House to dignify the name calling by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] by noticing it. Feeling that it is the desire and aim of the majority to finish the consideration of the bill today, I will desist from answering the unfair, unwarranted, unjustifiable, and wild intemperate statement that the gentleman from Mississippi has made about me. I would appreciate, however, that the membership read his statement appearing on page 2142 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Monday, March 17, 1947.

Mr. Speaker, as to the rule before us: It provides for 3 hours of general debate, after which the bill will be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. A great deal of time will be consumed in such consideration. I am hopeful that we can finish with the bill today, and I shall take no more time than necessary.

THIS BILL MAY BLOCK ARMY-NAVY MERGER

As my colleague the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. CHENOWETH] has already explained, the bill aims to facilitate the procurement of supplies and services by the War and Navy Departments. It is an important bill; but I fear that the main aim of the bill is to stop the consideration and adoption of a measure in which I believe most of us are deeply interested, namely, the bill to merge the Army and the Navy.

During the hearings before the Committee on Rules my versatile friend the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON], the former chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, stated that he has a bill that he feels will bring about what is contemplated by this bill. I urge that that bill, as well as the merger bill, be embodied in one bill and that we make one bite of it.

ADVOCATES SINGLE PURCHASING PLAN

I believe in the merger. I believe we should bring about unification of purchasing by the Army and the Navy. We all know the tremendous cost caused by lack of unified service during the war. The records and the evidence disclose that we could have saved millions upon millions of dollars had that been done.

I am for economy, and I hope that you all are. Consequently, I feel that we should not do anything that would preclude the passage of the merger bill. By a merger we could bring about real economy.

TEXT OF VINSON BILL

In that connection, Mr. Speaker, and so gentlemen will know of what I speak, I insert at this point the text of the Vinson bill, H. R. 2006:

Be it enacted, etc., That it is the sense of the Congress that many commodities used by both the Army and the Navy should be purchased or acquired by joint procurement in the interest of economy and standardization.

SEC. 2. There is hereby established an independent agency of the Government to be known as the Joint Army and Navy Procurement Board, hereinafter referred to as the "Board." The Board shall consist of five members, one of whom shall be a civilian, two of whom shall be officers of the Army, and two of whom shall be officers of the Navy. The civilian member of the Board, who shall be the Chairman thereof, shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for a term of 6 years and shall receive compensation at the rate of $15,000 per annum. The members of the Board who are officers of the Army shall be assigned to duty as members of the Board by the Secretary of War and shall serve as members of the Board during the pleasure of the Secretary of War. The members of the Board who are officers of the Navy shall be assigned to duty as members of the Board by the Secretary of the Navy and shall serve as members of the Board during the pleasure of the Secretary of the Navy.

SEC. 3. (a) It shall be the function of the Board to purchase or procure, under rules and regulations to be prepared and published by the Board, all petroleum and petroleum products, all materials for the construction of buildings, all textiles, all clothing and shoes, all drugs and medical and surgical supplies, all food and subsistence stores, all ammunition, all small arms, all real estate and interests in land, all motor-propelled vehicles having a commercial chassis, all tires, all critical materials for reserve stocks, all furniture, and all office supplies and stationery which are to be used by either or both the Military and/or the Naval Establishments. The Board shall be the sole purchasing agency of the commodities named in this section which are to be used by either or both the Military and/or the Naval Establishments.

(b) The commodities named in this section shall be purchased or procured by the Board upon requisition by the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy and shall be allocated and made available by the Board to the Secretary who makes requisitions. The cost of commodities purchased or procured upon requisition of the Secretary of War and made available to him by the Board shall be charged to appropriations made for the Military Establishment. The cost of commodities purchased or procured upon requisition of the Secretary of the Navy and made available to him by the Board shall be charged to appropriations made for the Naval Establishment.

(c) The commodities named in this section which are now procured through the Procurement Division of the Treasury Department by or in pursuance of law shall be continued to be so procured, and commodities procurable from manufacturing establishments owned and operated by the War and Navy Departments shall be procured from such establishments to the extent the Board shall determine to be in the public interests and such determination by the Board may be waived or modified only by the President.

SEC. 4. (a) The Board is authorized to appoint and fix the compensation of such civilian personnel as may be necessary to perform its functions. Such appointments shall be made and such compensation shall be fixed in accordance with the provisions of the civil-service laws and the Classifications Act of 1923, as amended.

(b) The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy are authorized to assign to duty with the Board, in addition to the members thereof, such personnel, both military and civilian, of the War and Navy Departments as the Chairman of the Board may request and the needs of the respective services may permit. The assignment of military, naval, or Marine Corps personnel to duty with the Board either as members thereof or in any other capacity shall be without prejudice to the status, rank, grade, rights, or privileges of such personnel in the services of which they are members, and they shall be paid while on duty with the Board from appropriations made to the services of which they are members.

SEC. 5. Within 60 days from the date of taking the oath of office by the civilian member of the Board, the Board shall report to the Congress rules and regulations prepared and published for the purchase or procurement of the commodities named in section 3 of this act shall be published in the Federal Register.

SEC. 6. No provision of this act shall be construed as preventing, limiting, or restricting joint purchase or procurement by agencies other than the Board of products or commodities other than those named in section 3 of this act, or as preventing purchase or procurement by the Board at the request of the Secretary of War and/or the Secretary of the Navy of products or commodities other than those named in section 3 of this act.

SEC. 7. There is authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to effectuate the provisions of this act.

SINGLE PROCUREMENT AGENCY CAN SAVE MILLIONS

The reason I favor adoption of the merger bill and the Vinson bill is, as I have said, that a single procurement agency can avoid duplication of effort and simplify and economize, and the expenses of the Military Establishments can be coordinated and restricted and bring about the elimination of such reckless expenditures as we had during the war.

I realize that during the war speed in procurement of arms and supplies and equipment was of paramount importance; even then, however, because of lack of standardization and uniformity and of single direction many manufacturers took advantage of the Government.

Proof of the recklessness of some of the contracts and expenditures lies in the report that by the adoption of the renegotiation act we made it possible to recover $6,740,673,000 on War Department contracts alone. Of course, much of this would have been rewon by income and excess profits tax; but remember that we scuttled the excess profits tax law, and consequently without the renegotiation act the people would have been out at least one-half of that saving of almost $7,000,000,000.

SAVINGS IN OTHER AGENCIES PROPORTIONATE

I regret that I do not now have at hand figures showing the recoveries under renegotiation by other agencies, such as the Navy Department, War Shipping Administration, and Maritime Commission; I am sure they would be proportionate and substantial.

It seems to me that in peacetime we should place definite restrictions on expenditures by the Military Establishments.

I had hoped that all contracts would be let by competitive bids, except where national security considerations of genuine urgency dictated the necessity of secrecy and of contracts on a negotiated basis.

DEPARTMENT GIVEN FREE HAND

I have regretted to discover, however, that this bill virtually gives the Department a free hand by making the following 14 exceptions which permit private and secret negotiations practically on a wartime basis, such as I have repeatedly opposed and condemned on this floor.

First. If determined necessary in public interest during the period of a national emergency declared by President.

Second. If public exigency will not admit of the delay incident to advertising.

Third. If aggregate amount of contract does not exceed $1,000.

Fourth. If for personal or professional services.

Fifth. If supplies or services are to be procured or used outside of the United States.

Sixth. If for medicine or medical supplies.

Seventh. If for supplies purchased for authorized resale.

Eighth. If for perishable subsistence supplies or services for which it is impracticable to secure competition.

Ninth. If the agency head determines that the purchase of contract is for experimental, developmental, or research work. Report to be made to Congress every 6 months citing name of contractor, amount of contract, description of work, with due consideration to national security.

Tenth. If agency head determines that character or ingredients are such that the purchase or contract should not be publicly disclosed.

Eleventh. For technical equipment which agency head determines the procurement is necessary without advertising in order to assure standardization, interchangeability of parts, and so forth.

Twelfth. For supplies or services which agency head determines that advertising and competitive bidding would not secure of a quality shown to be necessary in the interest of the Government, or for supplies of a technical or specialized nature requiring a substantial initial investment, or extended period of preparation for manufacture, which may require duplication of investment.

Thirteenth. Preserves the authority to negotiate contracts.

Fourteenth. Permit any negotiation under any relevant after-enacted law.

SECRET NEGOTIATION LEADS TO FAVORITISM

I have opposed and condemned secretly negotiated public contracts for many reasons. One of those reasons most persuasive to my mind is that such negotiations are an invitation to favoritism, to special treatment to contractors who have, for any of many reasons, some perfectly legitimate and some actually unsavory, ingratiated themselves with the contracting officers.

The net result is likely to be that big companies are favored at the expense of the little fellows, the small businessmen that we have tried to help by constructive legislation; that new ideas are discouraged in favor of existing facilities of favored contractors.

For my part, Mr. Speaker, I continue to urge and advocate merger of the services and merger of the procurement agencies, with the utmost practicable restrictions on privately negotiated contracts. The public interest and the real economy of efficiency should always come first.

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to go into a detailed discussion of the bill which will be brought before the House by the adoption of this rule but rather to make some comments concerning the question which the gentleman from Illinois has just raised. He has urged that this measure, which in effect provides for a uniform method of making contracts by the War and Navy Departments, should be made a part of a bill to unify the two departments. Unfortunately, for the gentleman's contention, that is quite impossible. Any measure for the unification, so called, of the War and Navy Departments, under the rules of the House, is referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. The bill for that purpose has already been introduced and is now pending before our committee—I happen to be a member of it—and hearings have been set upon it to start on next Tuesday. That bill does not pretend to alter any basic law governing the activities or the pursuit of policies by the War or Navy Departments or the Air Corps; it merely has to do with the structure, the administrational set-up of the departments if integrated as proposed by the pending legislation.

It should be understood—and a good many people, I think, do not understand it—that the Committee on Expenditures of the House of Representatives has no legislative jurisdiction over legislation involving policy. For example, the Committee on Expenditures has no jurisdiction in this so-called unification bill over the pay of the Army and the Navy and the Marine Corps. That belongs to the Committee on Armed Services. The Committee on Expenditures has no jurisdiction whatsoever relating to how contracts shall be let by the Army and the Navy. Only the Committee on Armed Services has that jurisdiction. The jurisdiction of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments is confined in this particular field to passing upon proposals for changing or altering the structural organization of a department of the Government. As the so-called unification bill does propose a structural reorganization or change, it comes to the Committee on Expenditures. So it is quite impossible for the Committee on Expenditures to take into consideration the problems involved in this bill which has been reported from the Committee on Armed Services.

Whether or not we enact legislation for the unification, so called, of the War and Navy Departments, legislation of this particular kind which is now proposed to be brought before the House must be enacted. It is just as feasible and proper to enact it before unification as it would be to enact it after unification. In my humble judgment, the Committee on Armed Services has acted entirely within its jurisdiction and very wisely in bringing to the House a suggestion, highly important, involving making uniform the method of letting contracts for the purchase of military supplies. Comprehensive legislation such as this is rare in our history. The Committee on Armed Services, in bringing it before us, has done its best—and I think successfully—to wipe out many statutes which no longer have any meaning or bearing under modern conditions. It proposes to the House uniform methods by which the purchasing agencies of these departments shall acquire supplies for the armed services.

One might go on for some time illustrating the difference between the jurisdiction of the Armed Services Committee and the jurisdiction of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, but I believe I have covered the ground within reason.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I have no requests for time. There are 3 hours' general debate provided and I do not wish to take up more of the time of the House.

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call to the attention of the Members of the House that the chairman of the Committee on Armed Services, the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANDREWS], has sent to each Member a copy of Report No. 109, which is the report on this bill, so that each Member has had this report on his desk for the past couple of days.

Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1366) to facilitate procurement of supplies and services by the War and Navy Departments, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 1366, with Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the gentleman from California [Mr. ANDERSON] is recognized for 1½ hours, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DREWRY] is recognized for 1½ hours.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 30 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, H. R. 1366, a bill to facilitate procurement of supplies and services by the War and Navy Departments, has been unanimously approved by the Armed Services Committee. The bill is the product of a great many months of intensive work. It reflects the sound accommodation of the collective views of the officials and procurement experts in the War and Navy Departments with the views of the Comptroller General, who approved the bill in the form in which it was introduced.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON of California. I yield.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. The gentleman made a very interesting reference to the Comptroller General of the United States, a former member of this body. I think at the outset, when so many Members are on the floor, it would be well if the gentleman would amplify that.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. I was going to add that this morning I called Mr. Lindsay Warren, the Comptroller General, for whom, as the chairman of the committee knows, every Member of the House has a very high regard. I was advised by him that since this bill was reported by the Committee on Armed Services he has had ample time to study it carefully and he advises me that the Comptroller General's office is solidly behind the proposed legislation. The bill has received the careful consideration of the Armed Services Committee. To the bill as introduced the Committee has added desirable safeguards.

Specifically, the bill will:

First. Provide uniform procurement authority for the War and Navy Departments;

Second. Reestablish the advertisement for competitive-bid method for the procurement of most military supplies and services;

Third. Consolidate within the framework of one statute the basic procurement authority of the services;

Fourth. Authorize negotiated contracts in a limited number of situations under proper safeguards;

Fifth. Assure small business an opportunity to secure a fair proportion of the total value of military purchases;

Sixth. Establish advertising standards designed to assure full and free competition;

Seventh. In the specified situations where negotiation is authorized, permit the use of that type of negotiated contract which will promote the best interests of the Government;

Eighth. Authorize advance payments generally during national emergencies and restrict in normal times their use to research and development contracts;

Ninth. Empower the Comptroller General on the recommendation of an agency head to remit liquidated damages paid or assessed against a contractor;

Tenth. Provide that the more important decisions made under the act, particularly those with respect to negotiated contracts, must be made by the agency head, as that term is defined in the bill;

Eleventh. Give finality to the decisions of the agency head both for his protection and for the protection of suppliers; and Twelfth. Repeal archaic and unnecessary laws.

To discuss the bill in greater detail, section 1 provides that War and Navy Department purchases with appropriated funds shall with certain specified exceptions be made by advertising. I shall have occasion to discuss these very important exceptions at a later point. At the same time section 11 provides for the repeal, effective with the end of the current fiscal year, of wartime laws under which broad authority to dispense entirely with advertising has been conferred, to the extent such laws are inconsistent. Title II of the First War Powers Act would thus be repealed. The selection of the end of the fiscal year as the effective date for repeal was deliberate on the part of the committee. This will give the services sufficient time to formulate policies and procedures, to establish machinery, and in general to prepare for the transition from purchasing under the First War Powers Act to purchasing under the new act.

Section 1, as I previously mentioned, does authorize the services in 14 specified and defined situations to negotiate contracts without advertising. Of these 14 situations, 8 are not really new.

Subsection (i) of section 1 authorizes the negotiation of all contracts during a national emergency. This is designed to permit the general activation of authority to negotiate in times of national emergency, found so essential during World War II, and is equivalent to the authority possessed by the services under the First War Powers Act. Subsection (ii) which permits the negotiation of exigency purchases is taken from Revised Statute 3709, the basic peacetime statute governing procurement. That statute is also the basis of subsection (iv) which relates to personal and professional services and of subsection (viii) which relates to the purchase of supplies and services where it is impracticable to secure competition. I think the phrase "impracticable to secure competition" in subsection (viii) requires some explanation. This subsection will permit the services to negotiate contracts in situations where there is an absence of competitive conditions. The most typical situation involves an article which can be obtained from only one supplier. But the authority will be available even where there are multiple sources if real competition is nonetheless lacking.

Since 1907 both the Army and Navy have had the authority to make negotiated purchases where the aggregate amount involved does not exceed $500. Subsection (iii), which increases this authority to cover purchases up to $1,000, merely recognizes the reduction in the purchasing power of the dollar since 1907. The Navy Department presently possesses the authority to negotiate purchases of supplies and services to be procured and used outside the United States and its possessions. Subsection (v) would extend this authority to the War Department. Both services have the authority to negotiate purchases for medicines, and this authority would be continued by subsection (vi). The authority to negotiate research and development contracts which is provided by subsection (ix) was given to the Navy Department by the last Congress.

We come now to a consideration of the subsections which contain new grants of authority. Subsection (vii) applies to supplies purchased for authorized resale. This authority will be used to purchase various articles with brand names for resale to service personel. It has been found necessary to purchase such items to accommodate the brand preferences of service personnel using these facilities. I think we can all understand the personal preferences of servicemen for a particular brand of cigarettes, toothpaste, hair oil, and the like. I might at this point emphasize the fact that this bill does not apply to purchases made with nonappropriated funds. Accordingly it will not apply to purchases for Army post exchanges and Navy ship's service stores. The Armed Services Committee is presently studying operations of post exchanges and ship's service stores and will be in a position to make any necessary recommendations in the near future.

Subsection (x) authorizes negotiated purchases where it is determined that the nature of the supplies and services should not be publicly disclosed. At the present time the War Department has this authority with respect to purchases of ordnance, chemical warfare and signal property and also of aircraft parts, instruments or aeronautical accessories. The necessity for this authority is so apparent that it requires no further discussion.

Subsection (xi) authorizes negotiated purchases of technical equipment where this is necessary in order to effect standardization of equipment and interchangeability of parts. The services have been presented with a difficult spare parts problem arising from the purchase of many standard commercial items. These are instances where a service has many different models and makes of the same basic equipment. This often means that it is necessary to have spare and replacement parts for each make or model. When one considers the broad areas over which the Army and Navy operate and the resulting supply problem it can readily be realized that every effort must be made to reduce the number of spare parts. One important way of effecting this reduction is by limiting the makes or models used by a service, that is, standardizing on a limited number of makes or models of the same equipment.

A grimmer phase of this problem often occurs in combat operations where a unit is cut off from its source of supply or supplies are not arriving in adequate quantities. The ability of the unit to maintain its position or to advance or even to survive may be directly dependent upon its ability to take the damaged equipment and through interchanging of parts make the equipment work. Certainly such instances underline the importance of the need for the greatest possible standardization.

An interesting and, fortunately, limited need for standardization results from the fact that the parts of certain highly complicated equipment are fully interchangeable only if manufactured by the same supplier. This situation exists in the case of certain equipment even though the same specifications, drawings, and manufacturing techniques are employed. A notable example of this occurred in the case of an airplane engine manufactured for the Navy Department. Two companies produced the same engine from identical blueprints; both engines performed properly; but the parts were not fully interchangeable. In equipment of this nature it is absolutely essential that all parts be capable of incorporation in the same equipment. Particularly in combat equipment the luxury of duplicate sets of parts for the same or similar equipment cannot be tolerated.

Standardization of equipment or limiting the types, models or makes of equipment has several other important virtues for the services. The many complex machines and instruments of warfare used by modern armies and navies have increased the period required to train personnel in their use and maintenance. It is, of course, obvious that anything that can be done to reduce or limit the number of different types of equipment will also simplify the training problem. The increasing number of complicated equipment has also necessitated increased specialization on the part of Service personnel. Here, too, anything that can be done to reduce the number of different equipments will reduce the need for specialization.

Subsection (xii) authorizes negotiation in circumstances where supplies and services of the necessary quality cannot be obtained through competitive bidding. This will enable the Departments to maintain necessary standards of quality in a way not possible when the procurement is by bid and award pursuant to general specifications. The more complex the weapons of war have become, the more difficult it has been to maintain quality control through specifications and inspection. For example, the Navy Department purchased gyro pilots from three different companies, all of which had excellent reputations as manufacturers. The products of all three companies passed rigid inspection in accordance with detailed design and performance specifications. When the pilots were put into operation, however, it was found that a number of the products of one company were defective. Exhaustive tests were conducted to determine the causes for this defect but were without success. Information on production techniques and tooling was exchanged by the companies but the pilots of the third company continued to be defective.

Subsection (xii) will also authorize negotiation in one additional situation which in part involves considerations of quality. Under this authority, procurement by negotiation may be made of supplies of technical or specialized nature requiring a substantial initial investment or an extended period of preparation for manufacture. This authority, however, may be exercised only after the agency head determines that competitive bidding may result in duplication of investment or preparation already made, or would unduly delay procurement of the supplies concerned. The committee has found that this authority is essential for the procurement of such items as military and naval aircraft, tanks, military and naval radar, guided missiles, rockets, and other technical equipment. To award contracts for such items after advertising for sealed bids would be highly time consuming and wasteful and would leave the procuring service with no assurance that it would secure supplies of proper quality.

Through the use of the authority contained in subsection (xiii) the services can make certain that extremely vital supplies, services, and facilities will be available in the case of a national emergency. Under this subsection contracts may be negotiated for supplies and services in order to preserve a highly strategic plant, mine, or other facility. They may also be negotiated in order to train a supplier in the manufacture or furnishing of critical supplies or services or to prevent the loss of such ability. This authority will not be widely used and will be subject to Presidential and congressional scrutiny. From the standpoint of dollars it is not an important aspect of the bill. But from the standpoint of national security—and I must plainly and emphatically make this point—this authority must be made available. If it is not, vitally strategic plants will fall into disrepair or will be devoted to other purposes and the ability of certain suppliers to furnish complex and necessary weapons and materials of war will be lost. The validity of the principle underlying this subsection was clearly recognized by the Congress in its passage of the act of June 16, 1938. By that statute the War Department was given authority to place "educational orders" for special munitions with selected commercial concerns.

Subsection (xiv) will preserve the authority to negotiate contracts that the departments have under certain statutes which are not repealed by section 11 of the bill. As an example, it will preserve the authority of the services under such laws as the act of August 2, 1946, which permits an agency in purchasing certain supplies to exchange or sell similar items and apply the exchange allowance or proceeds to the purchase price.

The bill surrounds the exercise of the authority to negotiate with substantial safeguards. Thus, the departments must report to the Congress on contracts made under the authority of subsections (ix) and (xiii). Moreover, the authority under subsections (x) through (xiii) may only be exercised after a determination is made by the agency head acting personally. The agency head includes only the Secretary, the Under Secretary, or an Assistant Secretary. In addition, under subsection (xiii) the decision of the agency head must be approved by the President. Further, all negotiated contracts are to contain a warranty that the contractor has not employed a broker or agent to secure the contract upon a contingent fee or similar basis. Finally, contracts for construction work within continental United States may be negotiated under the authority of only six of the subsections of section 1, namely, subsections (i), (ii), (iii), (viii), (ix), and (x).

Procurement by negotiation means to some people the selection by more or less arbitrary methods of a supplier and the payment to him of a price which he has been able to set without fear of competition. This is not the negotiation method followed by the War and Navy Departments or by industry generally. With them the first step in negotiating a contract consists of securing informal quotations from as many sources as practicable, usually accompanied by a break-down of the elements of cost. Separate negotiations then begin with the lower bidders in order to reduce the price by eliminating unnecessary or unjustified charges. When the best possible agreement has been reached an appropriate contract is awarded the successful firm. Experience has shown that by careful negotiation and by drafting a suitable contract it is frequently possible to secure substantial savings for the Government. In fact, negotiation properly employed often promotes and intensifies competition.

Section 2 declares that it is the policy of the Congress that a fair proportion of the total volume of military purchases and contracts shall be placed with small business concerns. This policy is implemented by two requirements: First, when not of manifest disadvantage to the Government, supplies and services shall be procured in reasonably small lots; and, second, whenever it is proposed to negotiate a purchase or contract in excess of $10,000 for supplies or services for resale and for medicine and medical supplies, suitable advance publicity wherever practicable shall be given for a period of at least 15 days.

Section 3 provides that advertising shall be so conducted as to secure for the Government the benefits of full and free competition. The requirements are of a general nature vesting considerable discretion as to place, medium, period, and frequency of advertising and as to other such matters as who may and how many must be present at the opening of a bid. It reiterates the principle that contracts shall be awarded to the lowest responsible bidder and provides that the Government may reject all bids and readvertise. The matter of determining whether a particular bidder is responsible is left, as it is under present law, to the sound discretion of the procurement agency.

Section 4 states that negotiated contracts may be of any type which will promote the best interest of the Government. Cost-plus-a-percentage-of-cost system of contracting is, of course, prohibited.

Also, neither cost nor cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contracts nor incentive-type contracts may be used unless they are likely to be less costly or it is impracticable to secure the required supplies or services without their use. Cost-type contracts will generally be restricted to research and development work, construction of overseas bases and initial production of highly complex material such as aircraft and the like. In the great majority of instances, negotiated contracts will be fixed-price contracts.

This authority to use the most effective contractual instrument will enable the procuring agency to secure prices, terms, and conditions which will result in the most economical purchases possible. As an illustration as to how this authority may be used to save Government money, take the case of a contractor who is to supply a new item for which there is available no cost experience for producing either this or similar items. If he is required to quote a straight fixed price, he will generally include in his quotation contingency allowances large enough to protect himself against possible loss. Should these contingencies not occur as they frequently do not, the contractor may realize excessive profits. If the procuring agency has the authority to use the most suitable type of contract, the contract may provide for redetermination of the price after a small part of the contract has been performed. Based on actual cost of performance data the contractor and contracting officer may agree on a redetermined price which is very much lower than the initial contract price. For another example, a supplier of a certain article may be willing to offer a lower price if the guaranty period is 6 months rather than 1 year. After analyzing the importance of the guaranty to the Department, the negotiator may decide that the saving effected through the lower price outweighs the value to the Department of the longer guaranty period. He will, accordingly, agree that the contract shall provide for the shorter guaranty period.

In the case of cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contracts, section 4 provides that the fee shall not exceed 10 percent of the estimated cost of the contract, exclusive of the fee. There are two exceptions to this requirement. In the case of research and development contracts a maximum fee or 15 percent is authorized, and in the case of contracts for architectural engineering services related to any public works or utilities projects the maximum fee is limited to 6 percent of the estimated cost of the project. You will observe that the maximum fees are increased over the present authorization of 7 percent. It is not expected that the maximum fees will be paid in each case. As a matter of fact, the services have testified that the present fees that they are paying under cost-plus contracts are well under 7 percent. The increase in the authorized fee is proposed only as a safeguard against the possibility that the Department may at some time have an urgent need for certain supplies and services and be unable to obtain them unless it is able to pay a fee greater than is now authorized. We must all take note of the fact that during time of war the services are not forced to compete with commercial sources as they must in peacetime. Particularly during good times, it may be difficult for them to place contracts unless they are able to meet prices paid by commercial consumers.

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON of California. I would be delighted to yield to my distinguished friend from New York.

Mr. COLE of New York. On the question of the cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contract, with respect to the percentage of cost allowable, the bill provides for a maximum percentage. Can the gentleman advise us what has been the average percentage that has been allowed on cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contracts, and can the gentleman assure the Congress and emphasize for future guidance of the departments that the maximum fixed in the bill is not intended to be a standard percentage allowance but rather a genuine maximum?

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Yes. I think the gentleman heard my remarks on that very subject. I indicated that it was not intended by the Congress that the maximum percentage should be allowed. In fact, the subcommittee has advice at this time that the average fee is less than 7 percent on cost-plus contracts.

Mr. COLE of New York. Is it not true that the average fee is substantially less than 7 percent?

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Yes. I am sorry that I cannot give the gentleman the exact figure, but we were advised by the Department that it is substantially less than 7 percent.

Mr. COLE of New York. My purpose in raising the question was to emphasize to the departments that this percentage is not to be considered as standard but as a genuine maximum, and that they should continue to obtain the contracts at the lowest percentage possible.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Yes. I am very grateful to the gentleman for raising that point, because I think the departments should know that that is the intent of the Congress.

Mr. COLE of New York. I thank the gentleman very much.

Section 5 authorizes the services to make advance payments under all contracts during periods of national emergency but during normal times only in the case of research and development contracts. The need for this authority during times of emergency is obvious. The need for this authority also exists in peacetime in the case of research and development contracts, many of which are with educational and research institutions or small business concerns which cannot obtain the necessary financial support from normal commercial sources. This authority to make advances under research and development contracts is already possessed by the Navy Department pursuant to Public Law 588, Seventy-ninth Congress.

Section 6 permits the Comptroller General, on the recommendation of the War and Navy Departments, to remit sums due the Government under contracts providing for the assessment of liquidated damages for delay in performance. As sometimes happens damages are required to be collected where the contractor is in no wise responsible for the delay and the Government has suffered no substantial damage. It is entirely proper that the Comptroller General should have authority in such cases to remit the damages due.

Section 7 deals with the delegation of powers granted the heads of the War and Navy Departments by the bill. As pointed out earlier the exercise of the new powers of negotiation under subsections (x) through (xiii) of section 1 requires the approval of the agency head acting personally. The agency head, as I stated previously, means only the Secretary, Under Secretary or an Assistant Secretary of either Department. Further, the authority to authorize advance payments may not be delegated. Also, the power to authorize research and development contracts is delegable only to a chief officer responsible for procurement and his first assistant. The committee is convinced that by placing responsibility at such high levels within each department abuses of authority will be prevented.

Section 7 also covers the matter of the finality of the decisions and determinations made under this bill. The committee is firmly of the opinion that the responsible officials of the War and Navy Departments should be given adequate authority to discharge their responsibilities. At the same time, it believes that they and the contractors with whom they deal are entitled to rely and act on their decisions.

Section 8 makes it clear that the Walsh-Healey Act, the Davis-Bacon Act and the 8-hour law apply to negotiated contracts. Section 9 defines the terms "agency head" and "supplies."

The purpose of section 10 is to make clear that the bill is applicable not only to purchases of supplies and services for the agency's own use, but also for purchases made by the agency for another agency's use.

Section 11 would repeal a great many conflicting, inadequate or outmoded statutes, so far as they apply to the War and Navy Departments.

In conclusion, H. R. 1366 will provide the services with uniform and necessary procurement authority. The exercise of this authority will be surrounded by adequate safeguards. The bill will arm the services with adequate and consistent procurement authority and will permit the use of procurement methods which will save Government funds and assure fair distribution of Army and Navy contracts among potential suppliers. All the members of the Armed Services Committee join with me in recommending the passage of this bill.

Mr. MANASCO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON of California. I am very glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANASCO. The gentleman has explained the bill very thoroughly. I have read the bill carefully and am impressed with the necessity of the passage of such legislation. I wonder if the gentleman's committee gave any consideration to the advisability of extending this legislation to all our executive departments. It occurs to me that we might save much money to the taxpayers if we had uniformity in the laws governing procurement.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. The committee did not consider extending this authority to any other Federal agencies. However, since the full committee reported the bill, the Treasury Department addressed a communication to the chairman of the Committee on Armed Services requesting permission to come under this bill for purchases for the Coast Guard, which, as the gentleman knows, reverts to the Treasury Department in peacetime.

The National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics also requested authority to come under the provisions of this bill in connection with the purchase of supplies for research and development. As the gentleman knows, the NACA is largely a research and development agency.

Mr. MANASCO. Is such an amendment going to be offered by the committee?

Mr. ANDERSON of California. I should like to advise the gentleman further, however, that the full committee had already completed action on the bill at the time those requests came in, so it was my suggestion, and the suggestion of the chairman of the full committee and the ranking minority member, that the request be transmitted to the Senate for consideration when this legislation reaches the other body.

Mr. MANASCO. I hope they will also consider bringing all Government agencies under the same legislation.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. I can assure the gentleman I am firmly convinced that the passage of this legislation will result in the saving of real money for the American taxpayers, and that is what this committee intends to see that it shall do.

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON of California. I yield with pleasure to my friend, the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. SIKES. May I compliment the chairman of the subcommittee on the very able work that he has done in bringing out this important legislation and on the fine presentation that he has made on the floor of the House. I certainly concur in all that he has said. I am sure from the reception given his remarks that there is no opposition to this fine legislation.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. I am deeply grateful to my friend from Florida for his kind remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DREWRY].

Mr. DREWRY. Mr. Chairman, last year under the so-called reorganization plan, the Committees on Military Affairs and Naval Affairs were merged into one committee known as the Armed Services Committee to handle all legislation for the Army and Navy. Some thought, and still think, that the volume of work required for each of these committees, Military Affairs and Naval Affairs, was so large and the specialized nature of the work for each committee was so important, that the two committees should have been continued in their respective jurisdictions. Nevertheless, like good soldiers, the members of the two committees accepted the decision of Congress with good grace and prepared to organize in accordance with the proposed plan.

As chairman of the Armed Services Committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANDREWS] promptly worked out his organization. With a genius for detail and organization he set up 12 subcommittees and with rare judgment and skill and some diplomacy, he started consideration of bills referred to the committee. He has unified the elements composing the committee and its work, and the entire committee under his leadership is giving him hearty and patriotic nonpartisan support in the attempt to make the merger work satisfactorily. There has been no partisanship and there will be none in this committee in their guardianship of the national defense.

This bill, H. R. 1366, probably the most important yet reported by the committee, affords a splendid example of what has just been said. The subcommittee handling this measure, under the fair and impartial guidance of its presiding chairman, the gentleman from California [Mr. ANDERSON], after several weeks of careful attention to the witnesses in the hearings unanimously reported this bill to the full committee. The full committee, with a few polishing amendments, reports it unanimously to the House for its consideration. So it comes to you with the unanimous agreement of the leaders of the Army and Navy, representatives of the business organizations affected by its terms, and with the coinciding views of the majority and minority members of the committee, and with the recommendation that the House accept it.

It is not claimed that this legislation is the final word on the subject of military procurement of supplies, nor is it claimed that it is perfect. It may easily be that the practical application of its terms may show the need for amendment. It is a new plan, possibly it might in a sense, be termed experimental. Some parts of it, however, have been tried and tested in the furnace of war, when our Army and Navy found by actual experience the necessity for closer coordination between our armed forces in the procurement of military supplies.

The admirable report filed by the committee is so complete in its analysis of this measure that I do not feel it necessary to take up the time of the House in going more fully into the details of the legislation.

In general, the bill provides that the Army and Navy shall unite in the procurement of supplies and services and a plan is proposed by which it shall be done in the simplest and most efficient way. The legislation provides also that competition shall be the key to its contracts and its purchases, thinking that the Government will benefit by this method and that every business will have an equal opportunity to bid in the open market. There are a few exceptions, however, that are noted in the bill where purchases are made without advertising, but safeguards are supplied to prevent abuses.

This legislation should be productive of greater economy in the outfitting and maintenance of our Army and Navy, not only in peacetime but also in wartime. It will also make permanent the procurement of supplies for the Army and Navy, and also stabilize our war effort if, perchance, such misfortune again overtakes us.

The remainder of the bill repeals unnecessary statutes inconsistent with the purposes of this legislation. The passage of this measure should result in a great saving to the Government, and will not only allow the business of the Government to be more efficient, but will also be in the interest of economy.

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes. Mr. Chairman, I desire highly to commend my distinguished colleague the gentleman from California [Mr. ANDERSON] for his splendid handling of this measure and his excellent presentation of the essential philosophy and provisions of this bill.

This bill has been carefully considered by the Armed Services Committee. It is approved by the Bureau of the Budget. It is satisfactory to business groups which do business with the Army and Navy. So far as I know there is no objection or opposition to this measure. It is unanimously reported.

In the main the bill makes uniform the purchasing procedures of the armed services. It contains definite safeguards to protect the Government and to accord to business in general adequate and fair opportunity under advertising and competitive bidding to do business with the Army and Navy. It provides full authority for the Army and Navy to act expeditiously in emergencies.

I believe this bill is an important step forward in integrating the procurement functions of our armed services. It is sound, flexible, and protective of the interests of the Government and American business alike. I ask its speedy, unanimous adoption by the House. Such action will serve notice that we intend to effect needed integration, greater efficiency, and flexibility in our armed services, and thus strengthen our national defense.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back 2 minutes.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VAN ZANDT].

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, since H. R. 1366, designed to facilitate procurement of supplies and services by the War and Navy Departments, and for other purposes, is a step in the direction of joint purchasing and since there is now pending in both branches of Congress a bill to unify or merge the Armed Forces, it is my intention to devote the time allotted to me to a discussion of the fact that joint purchases by the Army and Navy have been in effect for many months and have been accomplished without the approval of any legislation.

In passing, may I urge that advocates of the proposed Army and Navy merger take time out to study the practice of joint purchases that have been followed for the past many months by the Army and Navy without any legislation.

This proves that any proposed methods to streamline our armed forces can be accomplished on a voluntary basis with the aid of Presidential directives and without any specific legislation. It is seriously doubted that merging or even streamlining the armed forces can be effected without great cost to the American people.

Mr. BONNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VAN ZANDT. I yield.

Mr. BONNER. I wish to ask the gentleman whether or not during the consideration of this bill in the committee the subject of one general purchasing agency for the Army, Navy, and other branches of national defense was discussed.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. It was, very briefly.

Mr. BONNER. I take it, then, that the present policy of cooperative purchasing that has been carried out now is the result of the mistakes they made during the war, the Army and Navy both bidding on the same material and thereby boosting the price of national necessities.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VAN ZANDT. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. I wish to point out to my distinguished friend from North Carolina that the former chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON], has introduced legislation which if passed will set up a joint procurement agency for all branches of the armed services. There has not yet been a report on that legislation from the various departments, but I do wish to reassure the gentleman that our subcommittee intends to go into that subject at a later date.

Mr. BONNER. I wish to point out that those of us who had the opportunity to visit both Army and Navy operating bases during the war were greatly impressed by the extravagance that was indulged in by all branches of the service in this purchasing program.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. I can assure the gentleman that the passage of this legislation before the House today will eliminate a great deal of the duplication we have had in the past.

Mr. BONNER. As the gentleman states, it is a step in that direction.

COORDINATING ARMY AND NAVY PROCUREMENT

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Few people realize how extensive Army-Navy collaboration in buying has become. In 1944, the Army and Navy bought jointly more materials than in the 3 years 1941, 1942, and 1943 combined. And the trend has continued upward.

Furthermore, with respect to all procurement, the Army and Navy work closely together. To a great extent they apply common policy and procedures.

Material requirements fall into two major categories: Items sufficiently similar to make coordination desirable; and items so different that coordination offers no advantages.

It would be absurd to centralize procurement to such an extent that Army Ordnance bought armor for carriers or Navy Ordnance bought armored tanks. Any effort to force such a compromise would endanger the men who must man the carrier or the tanks. In other cases the danger is no less real, though it may be less obvious.

If standardization is forced too far, the result is a compromise that will not adequately serve the needs of either service. The Army and Navy must guard against overstandardization and orthodoxy which may retard imagination and dilute the quality of weapons.

An analysis of all Navy material procurement for fiscal years 1944 and 1945, totaling approximately $50,000,000,000, shows the following division:

	Percent
Purchases actually coordinated:
Purchased by the Army for the Navy	10
Purchased by the Navy for the Army	10
Purchased by the Navy in collaboration with the Army	9
Purchased by the Navy as part of Army-Navy group purchases	12
Purchases actually coordinated	41
Field of possible further coordination	17
Special Navy technical items	42
Total	100

Joint procurement is desirable for many service purchases; it is extremely dangerous for many others.

Of the field wherein joint procurement is possible over 70 percent has already been coordinated, and aggressive efforts are being made to cover the remainder.

Economy in government is the necessary and popular goal of our Nation. During the war years any consideration of economy was overshadowed by the more pressing and more important considerations of military necessity. Now, however, no longer faced with the problems and the waste involved in fighting a global war, the question of economy in government has assumed paramount importance. It is the principal argument advanced by the proponents of merging the armed forces, and they promise that great savings will result, especially in the field of procurement.

It is very true that some money can be saved through joint purchasing by the armed services. The alleged economies that will result from merger, however, must lie in the field of items which are used by, or adaptable to, both services, but which are purchased on a unilateral basis or, worse, in competition with one another. The record shows this a surprisingly small field—almost nothing, in fact—shows that a very great amount of Army and Navy purchasing is already being carried out jointly.

Various forms of coordinated purchase by the Army and Navy were undertaken early in the war, and by now cover a great percentage of expenditures for items susceptible to coordination. This policy accomplished much that was desirable in that it eliminated priority competition between the War and Navy Departments, it enabled industry to prepare necessary production schedules, and led to decreased costs because of uniform price levels and the reduced need for procurement personnel and other administrative overhead.

A good example of this coordination lies in the procurement of food and lumber. Throughout the war these two items were purchased by cross procurement; that is, making use of but one organization—the most expert in the field—in the purchasing operation. In other words, one service bought all of the material needed by both services. The Army Engineers purchased all lumber used by the Army and the Navy, while the Army Quartermaster's Office purchased the food used by both services. Other numerous examples may be found in the procurement of tractors, with the Corps of Engineers responsible for supplying both services, and in the procurement of distillation units, landing craft, and pontoons, with the Navy responsible for filling the requirements of both services. During 1944 approximately 46 percent of the Navy's motor-vehicle requirements were purchased by the Army and the remainder were procured directly by the Navy from commercial concerns because of marked difference in technical design caused by differing military requirements.

Even before 1942 there was coordinated procurement of aircraft engines, air frames, and propellers, and there is now almost complete coordination in the design and requirement stage of service aviation. The dollar value of savings which result from this policy may be realized when we consider that approximately 35 percent of our total wartime expenses for munitions products was made up of aviation equipment.

To insure the most effective operation, and least cost to the Government, in the field of aviation it is, and has been since before the war, the policy and practice of the services to combine purchase wherever practicable, both during peace and during war. To this end a list of all manufacturers of airplanes, aircraft engines, propellers, and even gliders, is maintained by the Aeronautical Board. Opposite the name of each manufacturer are columns which show the cognizance of each service in that plant. Thus it is possible at a glance to see, for instance, that the Navy has primary responsibility for the armed forces contracts at Pratt & Whitney. This responsibility includes the elements of inspection, cost inspection, allocation of productive capacity, and security, to the complete elimination of duplication.

On the other hand, the Army Air Force is assigned responsibility over Curtiss-Wright. This system of agreement as to cognizance worked extremely well during the war and is being maintained during peacetime. In the example given, the Navy handled all purchases from Pratt & Whitney and the Army handled those from Curtiss-Wright. They then distributed the products of both manufacturers between the two services according to initial requirements.

One of the functions under aeronautical procurement, as well as other types, is the service of inspection of material. During the war it was found desirable to inspect some material at source so as to prevent undue waste because of rejection of finished products. The inspection of aluminum products came under this category, and the Navy made all of the "at source" inspections for aluminum produced under joint Army-Navy specifications. That this policy of single-service inspection saved large sums in the aeronautical field alone may be realized when it is considered that during the third quarter of 1944 a total of 65 percent of all aluminum produced by industry was utilized by the aircraft manufacturers.

Purchase is not the only field in which close coordination of aviation material exists. There is coordination in the research and development of aviation radio and electronic equipment, ordnance, and armament. Examples of this coordination which already exists, and which saves countless dollars through avoiding duplication of effort can be found in all fields of aviation endeavor. Complete agreement has been reached, for instance, on the 5-inch HVAR rocket and the all-electric bomb rack releases, and these items have been standardized for use by either service. In development of the micro-wave radar, the spectra band within the K range has been apportioned, while the characteristics of airborne radio equipment have been agreed on and standardized. The research and development programs of the Army Air Force and the Bureau of Aeronautics are closely coordinated to prevent undesirable duplication.

As an example, last year during a meeting of one of the Aeronautical Board subcommittees, at which the proposals and contracts of the two services were reviewed, it was discovered that both services were considering almost identical proposals involving the development of a nose turret and the development of a wing tip turret. The proposals were modified; the Navy agreed to relinquish interest in the wing tip turret program while the Army Air Force dropped their program for the new nose turret. It was estimated that probable savings from this coordination and elimination of duplication would amount to approximately $1,500,000. Of current joint interest and joint effort, for both the AAF and the Bureau of Aeronautics are the problems imposed by high altitudes, a new design for air cargo transport, and a system of standard lighting for aircraft which will be adopted by all civil and military planes.

For years the Army Air Force and the Bureau of Aeronautics have been working on the development of joint Army-Navy specifications and standards. There are thousands of the so-called Army-Navy standards and specifications compiled today, and the work is continuing. Recently a series of Army-Navy specifications covering the turbo-jet engines was approved.

Representatives of the aircraft industries play a part in this work since they must be cognizant of material specifications of the services. Advance copies of all Army-Navy standards are distributed to aircraft-industry representatives for review and comment, and if disagreement exists on any item the matter is reconsidered so that an acceptable compromise may be worked out. The two services jointly publish an index of current Army-Navy aeronautical standards on a semiannual basis, and copies are available to all contractors and prospective contractors for Government aviation equipment.

I do not mean to imply that there is no duplication between the services in the field of aviation. But there is little undesirable duplication, especially that type of duplication which places the buyer at a disadvantage. Representatives of both services are of the opinion that some parallel efforts are desirable in the development of new and unconventional equipment. Recent projects on which desirable and justified parallelism exists include investigation of microwave communication, automatic-jamming systems, pattern and impedance studies, and advanced antenna design for guided missiles. In all cases the justification for this effort is based on the different tactical requirements of Army and Navy, and the importance of research in new fields which are broad in aspect and provide many possibilities for new techniques. It is controlled duplication, however, and information is freely exchanged between the two services.

The field of ordnance matériel, like that of aeronautical equipment, provides many similar evidences of joint effort and close cooperation between the services. The ordnance procurement efforts of both departments are closely coordinated and single-service procurement has been established for practically all common items. As an example the Navy and Marine Corps requirements for small-arms ammunition have long been furnished by the single-service purchase of the Army, while the Navy purchases all rockets in excess of 5 inches.

The ordnance research and development programs for both services are coordinated under the Joint Research and Development Board, and each service uses the facilities of the other service wherever desirable or necessary. The Army, for instance, has made frequent use of the Navy's test facilities in California and Virginia. Wherever feasible and economical the two departments use each other's ordnance shipping facilities interchangeably. As an example, during the war and at the present time the Army is using the Navy's shipping facilities at Earle, Port Chicago, and Bangor.

But coordination of purchasing during the war was not limited to lumber, subsistence stores, aviation matériel, and ordnance equipment. Few people realize just how extensive was this Army-Navy coordination. An example may be found in the study of Navy purchases for 1944 and 1946. During this period the Navy bought matériel costing $50,000,000,000, and yet 42 percent of the total was purchased through coordination with the Army. Forty-one percent of the total comprised items which were peculiar only to the Navy, items which had no counterpart in the Army. In this field coordinated purchasing was not feasible. As an example, an Army officer would be scarcely qualified to purchase a periscope for a submarine. The remaining 17 percent of Navy purchases for this period were, perhaps, adaptable to coordination.

With the end of the war, entirely different items and commodities became the most important. Aircraft purchasing, for example, fell sharply, while food and fuel became relatively far more important. Consequently it is not possible to determine trends by comparing data for 1944–45 and for 1946. However, it can be said that the services are aggressively seeking to broaden the area of purchase coordination.

During fiscal 1946 the new contract obligations assumed by the Navy amounted to almost $4,250,000,000. Of this sum, 52 percent represented purchases which were coordinated with the Army through joint and single service procurement or through collaborative buying, while 30 percent of the over-all total is comprised of items for which the Army has no need, such as arresting gear for decks of aircraft carriers or submarine periscopes. The remaining 18 percent of the total is perhaps, susceptible to some coordination.

Since 1945, the services have been able to tackle this remaining field more aggressively. Purchases in various additional fields are now being handled jointly. In the case of medical supplies, a joint buying agency has been established in New York, utilizing an integrated staff of both Army and Navy officers.

The purchases which have heretofore been made under some form of coordination have totaled many billions of dollars. From this very considerable experience, the services have been able to reach certain conclusions as to the best ways of coordinating their purchases:

First. Different types of commodities require different methods of coordination.

What works best for one may not work well for another.

Second. Three principal methods of coordinating purchasing have been developed—cross procurement, joint buying agencies, and collaboration of buyers. A joint buying agency results when a new organization with representatives from each service is set up to buy for both services. Collaboration of buyers is a system in which both services continue to do their own buying but do so in one common location, so that buyers for both services sit side by side and are able to work out many problems jointly.

Third. Of the three methods, cross procurement—also called single-service procurement—is considered the best, though the other two methods have their own advantages, particularly in the early stages of combining purchases of the two services.

Fourth. It is very important to distinguish between common-use items on the one hand and highly technical special-use items on the other. By "common-use items" the Navy means both items which are now identical for the two services, and for which specifications have been standardized and those which could be made identical by agreement on specifications. By special-use items we mean those items whose technical aspects are controlled by distinctive military use, such as submarine periscopes, torpedoes, airplane catapults, etc.

Fifth. Common-use items can be procured jointly, and the purchase of such items may even be centralized. The Navy centralizes the purchase of its common-use items in the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts and the Army makes similar use of the Quartermaster General. It seems clear that further coordination will most easily be achieved in this area.

Sixth. Economy in purchasing absolutely demands that special-use technical items be bought close to technical engineers and design specialists. Otherwise, many, many opportunities to save money are lost because the person responsible for buying these technical items lacks information about the ways in which savings can be accomplished.

Seventh. At least 70 percent of the field for possible joint purchasing has already been coordinated. Aggressive efforts are not being made to cover the latter, and to broaden the field of possible coordination as much as possible.

For example, in recent weeks the fields of petroleum and coal have been carefully studied, and it seems quite probable both these items will shortly be placed, at least in major part, under single service purchasing.

Eighth. Many people entertain notions as to the exaggerated savings which are possible through coordinated procurement. The average observer is likely to suppose that the bigger the quantity purchased by a single order, the smaller the price which can be secured. As to small purchases, this is unquestionably true. The limit of this kind of savings is reached when any one purchase equals the size of the most economical production run of the cheapest available manufacturer. Beyond that, joint prices may and sometimes do increase as bigger purchases become necessary. In recent textile purchases, for example, both services found that manufacturers were willing to quote lower prices for smaller quantities and insisted on higher prices if they were required to furnish bigger quantities. Thus the field of potential saving through quantity purchases is not nearly so large as is commonly supposed, because both services separately approach the limit of economical purchases for a great many of their items. In the case of coal, for example, all available evidence indicates that coordination of purchases will mean little, if any, reduction in unit prices; each service buys enough coal to secure maximum savings from quantity purchases. The probable saving will come from the possibility of eliminating personnel now engaged in buying coal for the services. While this saving is of course truly worthwhile, it nonetheless represents less than ½ of 1 percent of the value of the coal purchased.

Until recently the services had to reach decisions regarding the coordination of purchases without any referee. To correct this deficiency the Secretaries of War and Navy on October 15, 1946, by an order approved by the President, gave the Chairman of the Army and Navy Munitions Board full power to make final decisions in case of disagreement between the two services on purchase matters. Consequently, for the last 8 months, the Armed Forces have had available all the mechanism and organization needed to achieve complete coordination of their purchases. Procurement men in both services agree that the same steps will be necessary no matter what is done with respect to reorganizing the services. It still will be necessary to study purchases of separate commodities in order to arrive at the best methods of coordinating each. The statements just made do not mean that the services will not proceed at full speed to coordinate their purchases further. On the contrary, irrespective of merger, they had already worked out mechanisms to accomplish the best possible results and to achieve the greatest possible justifiable economies.

Economy gained at the expense of operating efficiency is, in the end, no economy at all but is, rather, "penny-wise and pound-foolish." We must take care, then, to insure that the economies we achieve are justifiable economies and not crippling to wartime efficiency, for the greatest single problem which confronts our country today is that of our future national security in a world of grim realities.

One of the most important requirements of any system of procurement is flexibility. Our peacetime needs must be met, yet the system must be capable of rapid expansion in order to withstand the tests and rigors of war. This was stated concisely by the Chairman of the Army and Navy Munitions Board, when in testimony before Congress, on January 22, 1947, he said:

> Our guiding principle is that we make sure that we install procedures in time of peace that are capable of expansion if an emergency is to be faced.

The current method of coordinated procurement, evolved during the war and now functioning effectively during peace, has proven its flexibility. We must guard against the adoption of any system of joint purchasing which will not meet this test. To adopt any system which may, perhaps, achieve minor economies in peacetime but which would be inadequate in wartime would impose the gravest threat to our national security.

So, you see, that already much has been accomplished in the way of joint purchasing.

Mr. BONNER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, just a week ago I had the opportunity to talk to a colonel in the Quartermaster Corps about surplus property, and the repurchase of surplus property that was sold, and the fact that the Army was declaring property surplus but at the same time buying similar property of recent manufacture. Has that been discussed in committee?

Mr. VAN ZANDT. No; it has not.

Mr. BONNER. Has the gentleman heard of any such instances?

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Yes; I have, but not in committee.

Mr. BONNER. I hear that said among various business people. It is a laughable practice, and I cannot imagine why either the Army or the Navy would permit such a thing to happen as declaring certain property surplus and then, on the other hand, buying similar property as of today.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. The situation the gentleman points out, of course, is one of the mistakes to be corrected.

Mr. BONNER. It really looks like a lack of administrative and business ability on the part of the high-ranking officers of both the Army and the Navy.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. I think you will find the Army and the Navy working in the direction of trying to correct these mistakes.

At this time permit me to read a partial list of the joint boards already functioning, totaling 38 in all: The Army and Navy Munitions Board, the Aeronautics Procurement Committee, the Medical Procurement Committee. Over in New York we have a joint procurement committee set-up for both the Army and the Navy which has been purchasing and supplying medicine and medical equipment for both branches of the service. Then there is the Marine Life Saving Equipment Committee, the Vessel Propulsion Committee, and so on. This is all intended, of course, to save the taxpayers money and to bring about a greater efficiency in the armed forces of our country.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Chairman, we have no further requests for time.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no further requests for time, the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all purchases and contracts for supplies or services made by the War Department and the Department of the Navy (each being hereafter called the agency) shall be made by advertising, as provided in section 3, except that such purchases and contracts may be negotiated by the agency head without advertising if—

(i) determined to be necessary in the public interest during the period of a national emergency declared by the President;

(ii) the public exigency will not admit of the delay incident to advertising;

(iii) the aggregate amount involved does not exceed $500;

(iv) for personal or professional services;

(v) the supplies or services are to be procured and used outside the limits of the United States and its possessions;

(vi) for medicines or medical supplies;

(vii) for supplies purchased for authorized resale;

(viii) for perishable subsistence supplies or other supplies or services for which it is impracticable to secure competition;

(ix) the agency head determines that the purchase or contract is for experimental, developmental, or research work or for manufacture or furnishing of supplies for experimentation, development, research, or test;

(x) for supplies or services as to which the agency head determines that the character, ingredients, or components thereof are such that the purchase or contract should not be publicly disclosed;

(xi) for technical equipment as to which the agency head determines that the procurement thereof without advertising is necessary in order to assure standarization of equipment and interchangeability of parts where it is shown that standardization of equipment and interchangeability of parts is necessary in the interest of the Government;

(xii) for supplies or services as to which the agency head determines that advertising and competitive bidding would not secure supplies or services of a quality shown to be necessary in the interest of the Government;

(xiii) for supplies or services as to which the agency head determines that the bid prices after advertising therefor are not reasonable or have not been independently arrived at in open competition;

(xiv) the agency head determines that it is in the interests of the national defense that any plant, mine, or facility or any producer, manufacturer, or other supplier be made or kept available for furnishing supplies or services in the event of a national emergency, or that the interests either of industrial mobilization in case of such an emergency, or of the national defense in maintaining active engineering, research and development, are otherwise subserved; or

(xv) otherwise authorized by law.

SEC. 2. It is the declared policy of the Congress that a fair proportion of the total value of all purchases and contracts shall be placed wtih small business concerns. As one means to that end, supplies and services shall, when not of manifest disadvantage to the Government, be procured in reasonable small lots or amounts.

SEC. 3. Whenever advertising is required—

(a) The advertisement for bids shall be a sufficient time previous to the purchase or contract, and specifications and invitations for bids shall permit such full and free competition as is consistent with the procurement of types of supplies and services necessary to meet the requirements of the agency concerned.

(b) All bids shall be publicly opened at the time and place stated in the advertisement. Award shall be made with reasonable promptness by written notice to the responsible bidder whose bid, conforming to the invitation for bids, will be most advantageous to the Government, price and other factors considered: Provided, That all bids may be rejected when the agency head determines that it is in the public interest so to do.

SEC. 4. (a) Except as provided in subsection (b) of this section 4, contracts negotiated pursuant to section 1 may be of any type which in the opinion of the agency head will promote the best interests of the Government.

(b) The cost-plus-a-percentage-of-cost system of contracting shall not be used, and in the case of a cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contract shall not exceed 10 percent of the estimated cost of the contract, exclusive of the fee, as determined by the agency head at the time of entering into such contract (except that a fee not in excess of 15 percent of such estimated cost is authorized in any such contract for experimental, developmental, or research work and that a fee inclusive of the contractor's costs and not in excess of 6 percent of the estimated cost, exclusive of fees, as determined by the agency head at the time of entering into the contract, of the project to which such fee is applicable is authorized in contracts for architectural or engineering services relating to any public works or utility project), and provided that neither a cost nor a cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contract nor an incentive-type contract shall be used, unless the agency head determines that such method of contracting is likely to be less costly than other methods or that it is impracticable to secure supplies or services of the kind or quality required without the use of a cost or cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contract or an incentive-type contract.

SEC. 5. (a) The agency head may make advance payments under negotiated contracts heretofore or hereafter executed in any amount not exceeding the contract price upon such terms as the parties shall agree: Provided, That advance payments shall be made only upon adequate security and if the agency head determines that provision for such advance payments is in the interest of the national defense and is necessary and appropriate in order to procure required supplies or services under the contract.

(b) The terms governing advance payments may include as security provision for, and upon inclusion of such provision there shall thereby be created, a lien in favor of the Government, paramount to all other liens, upon the supplies contracted for, upon the credit balance in any special account in which such payments may be deposited and upon such of the material and other property acquired for performance of the contract as the parties shall agree.

SEC. 6. Whenever any contract made on behalf of the Government by the agency head or by officers authorized by him so to do includes a provision for liquidated damages for delay, the Comptroller General on the recommendation of the agency head is authorized and empowered to remit the whole or any part of such damages as in his discretion may be just and equitable.

SEC. 7. (a) The determinations and decisions provided in this act to be made by the agency head shall be final. Except as provided in subsection (b) of this section 7, the agency head is authorized to delegate his powers provided by this act, including the making of such determinations and decisions, in his discretion and subject to his direction, to any other officer or officers or officials of the agency.

(b) The power of the agency head to make the determinations or decisions specified in subsections (x), (xi), (xii), (xiii), and (xiv) of section 1, and in subsection (a) of section 5, shall not be delegable and the power to make the determinations or decisions specified in subsection (ix) of section 1 shall be delegable only to a chief officer responsible for procurement and his first assistant.

(c) Each determination or decision required by subsections (ix), (x), (xi), (xii), (xiii), or (xiv) of section 1, by section 4, or by subsection (a) of section 5, shall be based upon written findings made by the official making such determination, which findings shall be final and shall be made available by the agency for a period of at least 6 years following the date of the determination. A copy of the findings shall be submitted to the General Accounting Office with the contract.

(d) In any case where any purchase or contract is negotiated pursuant to the provisions of section 1, except in a case covered by subsections (ii), (iii), (iv), or (v) thereof, the data with respect to the negotiation shall be preserved in the files of the agency for a period of 3 years, following final payment on such contract.

SEC. 8. No purchase or contract shall be exempt from the act of June 30, 1936, as amended (49 Stat. 2036, as amended by the act of June 28, 1940, 54 Stat. 681, and by the act of May 13, 1942, 56 Stat. 277; U. S. C., title 41, secs. 35 to 45), solely by reason of having been entered into pursuant to section 1 hereof without advertising, and the provisions of said act and of the act of June 19, 1912, as amended (37 Stat. 137, as amended by the act of September 9, 1940, 54 Stat. 884; U. S. C., title 40, secs. 324 and 325a), if otherwise applicable, shall apply to such purchases and contracts.

SEC. 9. As used herein, the term "agency head" shall mean the Secretary, Under Secretary (if any), or any Assistant Secretary of War or of the Navy, respectively.

SEC. 10. The provisions of this act shall apply to all purchases and contracts made by any agency for its own use or otherwise.

SEC. 11. (a) The following acts, insofar as they apply to procurement of supplies or services by the War Department or the Department of the Navy, are hereby repealed:

Revised Statutes, section 3709 (U. S. C., title 41, sec. 5);

Revised Statutes, section 3716 (U. S. C., title 10, sec. 1202);

Revised Statutes, section 3717 (U. S. C., title 41, sec. 9);

Revised Statutes, section 3721, as amended (U. S. C., title 34, secs. 569–570);

Revised Statutes, section 3724 (U. S. C., title 34, sec. 574);

Revised Statutes, section 3726 (U. S. C., title 34, sec. 577);

Revised Statutes, section 3727 (U. S. C., title 34, sec. 578);

Revised Statutes, section 3729 (U. S. C., title 34, sec. 579);

Act of June 14, 1878, No. 30 (20 Stat. 253; U. S. C., title 34, sec. 565);

Act of March 3, 1893 (ch. 212, sec. 1, 27 Stat. 732; U. S. CC., title 34, sec. 566);

Act of March 2, 1907 (ch. 2512, 34 Stat. 1193; U. S. C., title 34, sec. 571);

Act of March 4, 1913 (ch. 148, 37 Stat. 904; U. S. C., title 34, sec. 575);

Act of October 10, 1940 (ch. 851, sec. 1, as amended, 54 Stat. 1109, as amended; U. S. C., title 41, sec. 6).

(b) The following parts of acts are hereby repealed:

(i) That portion of the act making appropriations for fortifications, approved February 24, 1891 (26 Stat. 769), relating to "Armament of fortifications," which reads as follows: "Provided, That no contract for the expenditure of any portion of the money herein provided, or that may be hereafter provided, for the purchase of steel shall be made until the same shall have been submitted to public competition by the Department by advertisement."

(ii) Those portions of the Army appropriation acts approved March 2, 1901 (ch. 803, 31 Stat. 905; U. S. C., title 10, sec. 1201); and June 30, 1902 (32 Stat. 514), relating to "Quartermaster's Department, Regular Supplies," which read as follows: "Provided further. That hereafter, except in cases of emergency or where it is impracticable to secure competition, the purchase of all supplies for the use of the various departments and posts of the Army and of the branches of the Army service shall only be made after advertisement, and shall be purchased where the same can be purchased the cheapest, quality and cost of transportation and the interests of the Government considered."

(iii) That portion of the Army appropriation act approved June 12, 1906 (ch. 3078, 34 Stat. 258; U. S. C., title 10, sec. 1205), relating to "Ordnance Department," which reads as follows: "Hereafter the purchase of supplies and the procurement of services for all branches of the Army service may be made in open market, in the manner common among businessmen, when the aggregate of the amount required does not exceed $500; but every such purchase exceeding $100 shall be promptly reported to the Secretary of War for approval, under such regulations as he may prescribe."

(iv) That portion of the Army Appropriation Act, approved May 11, 1908 (ch. 163, 35 Stat. 125; U. S. C., title 10, sec. 1199), relating to "Ordnance Department," which reads as follows: "Whenever proposals are invited for the furnishing of articles of ordnance property, the character of which or the ingredients thereof are of such a nature that the interests of the public service would be injured by publicly divulging them, the Chief of Ordnance is authorized to purchase such articles in such manner as he may deem most economical and efficient."

(v) That portion of the War Department Appropriation Act, approved May 15, 1936 (49 Stat. 1299), relating to "Arms, uniforms, equipment, and so forth, for field service, National Guard," which reads as follows: "Provided, That specifications for motor vehicles, which shall be so drawn as to admit of competition, shall to the extent otherwise practicable conform with the requirements of the National Guard."

(c) All other laws and parts of laws to the extent that they are inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. ANDERSON of California (interrupting the reading of the bill). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with, that it be printed at this point in the RECORD, and that it be open to amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 5, after the parentheses and before the words "shall be", insert the words "and to be paid for from appropriated funds."

Page 1, lines 9 and 10, strike out "intest" and insert in lieu thereof "interest."

Page 12, line 6, strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof a comma, and add "effective as of June 30, 1947."

Mr. ANDERSON of California (interrupting the reading of the committee amendments). Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that most of the committee amendments are simply clarifying and corrective amendments, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments be printed in the RECORD at this point and that they be considered en bloc.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the chairman of the subcommittee as to the attitude of the Comptroller General on this bill.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. I shall be glad to answer the gentleman's question, as I did in my remarks on the floor of the House earlier today. The Comptroller General approved the bill as originally introduced, and this morning, after the bill had been reported out by the full committee as amended, I called him up to ask him his attitude toward this legislation. He said he was delighted that the committee had reported it out and he was glad to see that the committee had also written other safeguards into the bill, and that his office was solidly behind this legislation.

Mr. BENDER. I would like to ask further if the General Accounting Office is satisfied with the manner in which the Army and Navy Departments are cooperating or refusing to cooperate with the General Accounting Office in supplying certain information.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. I did not take that question up with the General Accounting Office, I will advise the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BENDER. I heard the gentleman's opening statement and his comment regarding Lindsay Warren, one of America's finest public servants. During the last 5 years the General Accounting Office has done an excellent job in recovering money for the taxpayers as a result of Army and Navy Department deficiencies. The Federal Treasury has been reimbursed as follows: For the year 1943, over $18,000,000; for the year 1944, over $39,000,000; for 1945, $86,000,000; for the year 1946, $112,000,000; and up to January 31, 1947, $85,000,000. The Accounting Office has just scratched the surface.

I have heard some of the tributes paid to the procurement divisions of the Army and Navy, and all the beautiful words that have been spoken commending them, but I say there is plenty of room for improvement. I trust that this bill will help in that situation.

I question, however, the bill having been sent to the Committee on Armed Services. It should have been sent to the Committee on Expenditures, where all measures pertaining to procurement belong.

I am sure Mr. Warren has not on all occasions been satisfied with the manner in which procurement has been handled by the Army and Navy. However, if he considers this a good bill, of course it should pass and pass unanimously.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, the bill before the Committee today has been thoroughly discussed and considered by the Subcommittee of the Committee on Armed Services over a period of many weeks. We have had very extensive hearings and discussed the matter from every viewpoint, because of the magnitude of the problem involved in procuring not only millions but hundreds of millions of dollars of supplies and matériel as the years go on.

The foreword of this bill, as you probably know, is predicated on what we might well say are the emergency needs of the services.

For the benefit of some Members of the House who do not know the background of the bill and the part the subcommittee played in this matter, we discovered as we went along in the analysis of the bill that the word "services" as interpreted by the War Department embraced even the procurement of buildings, the construction of buildings and public works, sewers, highways, and everything of that description. That is a far-reaching interpretation of the word "services." However, once we had that construction and interpretation placed upon the word "services," we immediately determined to safeguard the interests of the people of the country so far as competition is concerned, in the development of specifications, the approval of plans, and the submission of bids, so that under the provisions of this bill every project embracing buildings, highways, and public works of every description, must be advertised and the award made on the basis of competition to the low bidder.

I can well understand the part the Comptroller General played during the war period and after the war period in the scrutinizing of all accounts, but after all, as a representative of the Congress of the United States, the Comptroller General's duty is to analyze expenditures of every branch of the Government. With his vast organization that is available for that purpose he may well bring to light perhaps many things that were overlooked by department heads, and then in the interest of the people make provisions for refunds to the Government.

On the other hand, when we think of the $300,000,000,000 or more that was spent by the armed services during this great war period, I think we can pass out also a few compliments to them in respect to the efficiency with which they operated not only along the battlefronts of the world but also in the procurement of these necessary materials, supplies, arms, and tools of war that made it possible for us to win this great conflict and bring peace to the world again.

As we survey the past 8 or 10 years we can well feel proud of the Naval Affairs Committees of the House and Senate and the Military Affairs Committees of the House and Senate, now combined in what is known as the Committee on Armed Services, for the job they have done, ably led in the case of the Committee on Naval Affairs by the splendid gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON], who did a magnificent job in initiating and giving impetus to the program of getting ships and naval facilities into the front line of action in order that we could bring this victory about in the quickest possible time.

This bill has been well considered from every viewpoint. We think it is in the interest of economy and efficiency of our armed forces. I trust the bill will be unanimously approved by the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 1366) to facilitate procurement of supplies and services by the War and Navy Departments, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 146, he reported the bill back to the House with sundry amendments adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMENDING THE FEDERAL RESERVE ACT

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 148 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2413) to amend the Federal Reserve Act, and for other purposes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall not exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. Speaker, the adoption of this resolution makes in order the consideration of H. R. 2413, a bill to amend the Federal Reserve Act, and for other purposes. This bill continues the authority which the 12 Federal Reserve banks now have to buy Government securities, up to the amount of $5,000,000,000, direct from the Treasury Department, and also continues their authority to sell Government securities direct to the Treasury Department.

This bill has been reported favorably by the Committee on Banking and Currency. There is a minority report signed by two members of the committee. This is an open rule providing for 2 hours of general debate, to be confined to the bill, the time to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. Speaker, from the time of their creation in 1913 until the enactment of the National Banking Act of 1935, Federal Reserve banks were authorized to make direct purchases of Government securities from the Treasury Department. The Banking Act of 1935 revoked this authority, however, and the Federal Reserve banks then had to make all purchases of Government securities on the open market. Under this system, the Treasury had no direct source from which to obtain large sums of money on short notice; and, therefore, had to maintain large cash balances for refunding maturities of public debt, and for other contingencies. Buying and selling transactions in Government securities between the Federal Reserve banks and the Treasury Department were again authorized under title IV of the Second War Powers Act of 1942, which amended section 14 (b) of the Federal Reserve Act. As title IV of the War Powers Act expires the last day of this month, H. R. 2413 is necessary to extend its provisions beyond March 31.

The committee does not feel that this direct-purchase authority should be made permanent, and recommends that the same terminate on June 30, 1950. In other words, this bill merely extends existing authority to that date.

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, reading the majority report on this bill one gets the impression that it is a very innocent bill and much to be desired. But upon looking into it carefully, I think you will agree that it is not quite as simple and as innocent as it might appear.

Here is what 46 members of the National Committee on Monetary Policy think of this measure:

Forty-six Members urge Congress to repeal all authority of the United States Treasury to sell its securities directly to the Federal Reserve banks.

That has reference to the authority which now exists under the Second War Powers Act. The statement is as follows:

ECONOMISTS' NATIONAL COMMITTEE ON MONETARY POLICY,
New York, N. Y.

FORTY-SIX MEMBERS URGE CONGRESS TO REPEAL ALL AUTHORITY OF THE UNITED STATES TREASURY TO SELL ITS SECURITIES DIRECTLY TO THE FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS

We, the undersigned, members of the Economists' National Committee on Monetary Policy, urge Congress not to pass that portion of H. R. 2233 which authorizes the Federal Reserve banks to purchase Government securities directly from the United States Treasury in an amount held at any one time up to $5,000,000,000.

Such authority, granted under the Second War Powers Act of March 27, 1942, was subject to a time limit which expires March 31, 1947. The present bill, even though the war has ended, contains no time limit.

(After the members of the Economists' National Committee on Monetary Policy had recorded their judgment on H. R. 2233, the House Committee on Banking and Currency, on March 10, reported out a bill, H. R. 2413, which provides for the renewal of the requested authority for a period of 3 years. An identical bill, S. 828, was introduced in the Senate on the same date by Senator TOBEY. It should be noticed, however, that the next to last paragraph of this signed statement says that "Even though the Treasury was granted such emergency power during the war, such authority now is clearly unnecessary and is unsound in principle."—W. E. Spahr, executive vice president.)

The flotation of Government securities should be tested in the market place unless some emergency arises which is so great that the Government cannot wait for popular subscription and must resort to direct monetization of the Federal debt as an unfortunate feature of the emergency.

The requirement that the Government, in times of peace, go to the people in the open-money markets for its borrowings is sound for the reason that the people are provided with one means of exercising some direct control over the public purse.

Even though the Treasury was granted such emergency power during the war, such authority now is clearly unnecessary and is unsound in principle. The Treasury should not request it; the Federal Reserve authorities should urge that it not be granted; and Congress should refuse to enact any such proposal into law.

We also urge the repeal of section 43 (a), (2), of the act of May 22, 1933, which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury and Federal Reserve authorities to enter into agreements under which the Reserve banks may make direct purchases of United States securities from the Treasury "in an aggregate sum of $3,000,000,000 in addition to those they may then hold."

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include this entire statement in my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time and therefore I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2413) to amend the Federal Reserve Act, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 2413, with Mr. VAN ZANDT in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT] is recognized for 1 hour and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SPENCE] will be recognized for 1 hour.

The gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. CHENOWETH] explained generally what the bill provides. From the time the Federal Reserve Act was originally passed in 1913 to the time when the Banking Act of 1935 was passed the Federal Reserve banks had the authority to buy directly from the Treasury. The Treasury had authority, likewise, to sell directly to the 12 Federal Reserve banks up to $5,000,000,000. When the Banking Act of 1935 was passed the authority was not continued.

In 1942 the authority was restored by section 1501 of the Second War Powers Act of that year. So, since 1942 the Treasury has had authority to sell, and the Federal Reserve banks have had authority to buy obligations directly from the Treasury up to $5,000,000,000.

The need for this lies in the fact that on very infrequent occasions the Treasury balances are or might be somewhat in jeopardy due to large withdrawals usually incident to the tax-paying periods, and by reference to the report you will find on page 2 of the report an information which gives the details of how this authority has been used since 1942.

It has been said that the power exists for the purpose of covering overdrafts or conditions which might result in overdrafts. You will notice that it is a day-to-day transaction, that very infrequently is the power exercised for more than 2 or 3 days at a time, with little or no expense to the Federal Treasury.

If this power did not exist in the Federal Reserve banks to buy directly from the Federal Treasury to prevent the reserves from being at a dangerously low point, they would have to sell the obligations in the open market, which would mean, of course, that the Federal Reserve banks could go into the open market, and undoubtedly would go into the open market and buy the same obligations for the same purposes that they would buy under the authority contained in this bill directly from the Treasury.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. It is my understanding that the authority existed from 1930 to 1935 but that the Federal Reserve was not limited to any particular amount in the buying of bonds and securities from the Treasury.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The gentleman is substantially correct, I believe. There was a provision written into the act of 1933, known as the Thomas amendment, which authorized the purchase directly of not to exceed $3,000,000,000 in obligations provided the President made certain findings.

The so-called Thomas amendment, which authorized the purchase directly of $3,000,000,000 of Government obligations, provided that that practice could only be indulged in when the President upon investigation found one or more of the following conditions to exist; and, without objection, I will read this in:

1. The foreign commerce of the Nation is adversely affected by reason of depreciation in value of the currency of any other government or governments in relation to the present standard value of gold; or

2. Action under this section is necessary in order to regulate and keep the parity of the currency issues of the Nation; or

3. An economic emergency requires an extension of credit; or

4. An extension of credit is necessary to secure by international agreement stabilization at proper levels of currencies of various governments.

At no time was that authority used, because at no time up to the present time did any one of those conditions exist since the authority was given in 1933 under the Thomas amendment.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. VORYS. I find no limitation in the bill before us, but there is a reference to some other part of the Federal Reserve Act. Is there any limitation in the law that would limit the use of this power to the emergency and other special circumstances where it has been used in the past?

Mr. WOLCOTT. It has never been used except as we say to cover these overdrafts or when overdrafts might be expected. By reference to the report you will notice that the amounts have been as low as $3,000,000, and the highest was on March 15, 1943, a taxpaying period, when it went up to $1,302,000,000. It has never been used for any other purpose than to create a situation which would authorize the Treasury to operate with a smaller cash balance than would otherwise be necessary if this power did not exist.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, if the utmost use that has ever been made of it was $1,302,000,000, what is the reason for needing an authority of $5,000,000,000?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I think we might hope, perhaps, that we will never have to use it, but it would not make any particular difference if they did use up to five billion. Mr. Eccles testified that we would be on much safer grounds if he had authority to buy up to ten billion. We have got to take into consideration that from now on we will be having refund operations incident to a $260,000,000,000 debt, and we have not had any of these transactions up to the present time in any large quantity, but as soon as the obligations of the Government start maturing and we go into these refunding transactions, and the Treasury draws down its balances to retire current issues, there might be occasion when temporarily, for a few days at a time, up to the time new issues can be marketed, that the Federal Reserve would have to step in and bolster up the actual cash reserve. So it is not in the interest of stabilization to restrict the power any less than five billion. I suppose some will take issue with me in this respect, but it is not the Government's money that is being used for this purpose. It is the Federal Reserve banks which buy the obligations from the Treasury, and they buy from the Treasury instead of buying them in the open market. I hope the time will never come when the Federal Government cannot use its central banking system, the Federal Reserve System, to stabilize its balances to a point where it will help to prevent fluctuations in the value of the currency. That is one of the reasons why it is desirable at this time to grant this authority. The Federal Reserve can go into the open market and buy these obligations if they cannot buy them directly, and it might cost the Government in refunding charges many millions of dollars more than it would for the Federal Reserve banks to buy directly from the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, there is no opposition to the passage of this bill from the minority members of the committee. It seems to me it is a very simple and common-sense device to take care of the overdrafts of the Treasury. This power was granted in the original Federal Reserve Act of 1913, and the power was retained until 1935 without limitation as to the amount that could be purchased. It was not included in the Banking Act of 1935.

In the Second War Powers Act of 1942 it was again conveyed to the Federal Reserve banks. That authority will expire on the 31st of this month. The authority had been used with moderation.

As the chairman of the committee has said the greatest amount of direct obligations that has ever been purchased from the Treasury at one time by the Federal Reserve banks, under authority of this statute, was $1,302,000,000. The Treasury pays one-fourth of 1 percent per annum on these obligations. I cannot see how anybody can have any apprehension as to the effect of this, nor are there any sinister implications in its passage.

You have heard something said about the Thomas amendment contained in the Banking Act of 1933. Not one dollar of direct obligations has ever been purchased under the Thomas Act and, as the gentleman from Michigan has said, the conditions have never existed that would permit those purchases.

I think the purpose of the bill is clearly defined and the authority cannot be abused. It is an expeditious and practical way to take care of the overdraft in the Treasury. There are no dangers that lurk in it as to the monetization of our public debt as some seem to fear. Originally there was no limitation on the power to purchase these direct obligations. Here the limitation is $5,000,000,000, less than 2 percent of the outstanding public debt in the United States, and that authority under this act will expire on June 30, 1950. I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, Mr. SPENCE, the ranking member of the minority side of the Committee on Banking and Currency, stated that no one on his side of the House was opposed to this bill. That was to be expected.

The citizens of the Nation elected a Republican Congress last fall and gave it a mandate to relieve them of the many troublesome and harassing New Deal controls that have been imposed upon them.

I think it not inappropriate in connection with this bill to emphasize this fact to the newly elected Republican Congressmen, especially those from closely contested districts. The sentiment for relief from political controls was an important factor in your districts in deciding your election contests.

Before us we have a bill to extend another wartime control. H. R. 2413, known as the Wolcott bill, proposes the extension of a New Deal, or totalitarian, measure to perpetuate certain war powers, and one of the most vicious of such powers, namely, that to permit the Treasury to create fiat money to meet general-fund shortages. The measure is potentially highly inflationary.

The usual New Deal technique is being resorted to for keeping alive what allegedly was to be only temporary legislation enacted to meet a war emergency, sweetening it by stressing that the extension is only for a limited period to meet a passing need, and depending upon Government officials with an ax to grind to show the necessity for it and their usual solemn promise that they will never abuse the law but always use it wisely, and so forth.

Specifically the Wolcott bill provides for extending until 1950 that part of the Second War Powers Act which authorizes the Treasury to borrow directly from the Federal Reserve an amount up to $5,000,000,000. Direct resort by the Treasury to the central bank—Federal Reserve—follows the classical pattern for uncontrolled inflation.

The proponents of this bill base their approval of it mainly on the ground that the authority here requested is nothing new; that it was used from the inception of the Federal Reserve System until 1935 and again from 1942 to the present time.

Strange to say, it was repealed in 1935 by the New Deal administration on the ground that it was a dangerous measure. Now the New Deal Party is back defending this very measure which it condemned in 1935.

The proponents of the bill also say that the authority has not been misused; that it has supplied an urgent need; and further that it provides a means whereby the Treasury can borrow money without having to pay interest.

Mr. Eccles, Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve—the only witness to appear before the committee—requested that the limit of the amount of funds to be raised under the bill should be $10,000,000,000 instead of five; he also wanted the legislation to be made permanent, as provided in the first Wolcott bill.

He stated that the purposes of the legislation were to provide the Treasury with the overdraft privilege, "a line of credit on which it could call at a moment's notice," to meet conditions where "the market situation was not satisfactory or favorable," or "for any purpose that was in the interest of the Government to use it," and to avoid paying interest on "idle balances" in the Treasury.

Is the New Deal asking for this power only for the purpose of meeting temporary shortages in the general fund? Not according to Mr. Eccles' statement, surely.

Why should not the Government pay interest on money it borrows, regardless of the purposes for which it may be used? "Oh," you say, "it is only for a day, or a week, or a month, that the Government wants to borrow money for nothing." If this be a perfectly innocent transaction, then why not authorize the Government to borrow money for 6 months, or a year, or 10 years, or 50 years, without having to pay any interest; and if for five billions, why not for ten, or fifty, or one hundred? Will some Member rise in his place and give an intelligent answer to these questions?

Mr. Eccles' statement to the committee that the power requested in the pending measure might be needed to meet a situation where the Government's credit was under a strain ought to be of the greatest interest to the Congress and the Nation.

To fully appreciate the significance of this request, we must examine the background of the thinking that brought it here. The policies of the Federal Reserve and the Treasury are the policies of the New Deal administration. It is notorious that the administrations in control of the Government since 1933 have consistently pursued a policy of inflation. The New Deal is based on Government printing-press money. Mr. Eccles has himself on numerous occasions given his blessing to this sort of money to finance Government deficits. If for no other reason than that the request for this power comes from those possessed of a fiat money complex it should be defeated.

Of course, anything that has even the possibility of restricting New Deal spending and controls is an anathema to the devotees of this cult. It strives with all its might to hold onto every vestige of power to control and to spend. It is highly allergic to everything that has even the remotest possibility of checking this power.

Is not the cost of living going up fast enough? Do we want more inflation? It cannot be overemphasized that this bill has potential possibilities of enormously exacerbating this greatest of all social maladies.

In taking our position on this bill we Republicans should keep in mind that almost everyone of us voted for the $6,000,000,000 budget cut. To be consistent we must vote against this bill. The $6,000,000,000 cut is deflationary, while the Wolcott bill now before us is inflationary.

There is no reason why any Republican should vote for this bill; there is every reason why he or she should vote against it. The Treasury will be deprived of no facility whatever for carrying on its normal functions if this request is denied. It can get what emergency funds it needs in the market, as it did from 1935 until 1942. There was no complaint about that arrangement. The cost to the Government to finance such emergency funds as it might need to overcome temporary general-fund shortages is minimal, but in any event proper.

The Republican Members should be reminded that the New Deal already has power under the Thomas amendment and the Gold Reserve Inflation Acts to issue printing press money to an amount exceeding $5,000,000,000. As previously stated, Mr. Eccles indicated he wanted the pending bill to provide authority to print ten billions more instead of five. What the New Deal wants is unlimited power to issue greenbacks, like Stalin has, and it will get that power if Congress continues to yield to its importunities.

It was the political power to create fiat money—John Law money, Lord Keynes money—that plunged France into despair in the early part of the eighteenth century and into utter ruin at the end of that century. The Bolsheviks intentionally used this device to overthrow the Czar's regime. It was this power that had more to do with creating Hitlerism than anything else. Do we want it to happen in America?

I should like also to remind the Republican Members that this bill is strongly opposed by 46 members of the Economists National Committee on Monetary Policy. I know something of the background of most of these men and consider their judgment on the pending bill to be sound.

Republicans should vote as a block against this bill.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY].

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill. I think it is the logical and sensible way to handle the problem of meeting the Government's obligations at taxpaying time, and would be the same principle that every sensible and successful businessman would use. It is a step away from monetizing the public debt rather than toward monetizing it.

What I would like to mention is the sad news that I have just learned that the Rules Committee is reporting to the House shortly a rule for the establishment of another special select committee.

This time we are going to establish a special select committee outside of the framework of the committee structure adopted by reorganization. Again I remind you that this committee structure was recommended by one of the most distinguished Members of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

We are being asked to establish this as a special committee on wildlife and conservation; a new committee allegedly to protect the Nation's wildlife.

I think it is high time that the Congress look at what we are doing in tearing down the reorganized committee structure. We have a complete duplication in this case as we have had in most other cases.

But it is a little clearer here, because we have a subcommittee of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries already charged with this specific duty. I understand we are going to reestablish this old special committee that is a hangover for 10 or 12 years past because a few people want it and a few members of the committee think it would be very nice to continue to work on it.

The proposed special committee has not any power to report legislation. It can only study as it has for 10 or 12 years past, and then issue documents and publications without the power to report or pass any legislation.

I think it is high time that we look at what we are doing. We are tearing down almost every week, by nibbling away, the structure of a very fine committee arrangement. This committee structure was the result of long study and careful consideration by the joint nonpartisan committee of the two Houses of Congress. It is high time we called a halt to this violation of the jurisdiction of our standing committees.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BUFFETT].

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Chairman, since this Congress came into session about 2½ months ago we have spent a great deal of time talking about various problems. We have not acted on the problems that we talked about in the campaign.

Most of us on both sides of the aisle declared we were going to end the war emergency powers. We pledged that we were going to stop inflation. So I have been reminded, since I came back, a great many times of a phrase in Scripture, where the lowly Nazarene going into the temple said:

> The scribes and the Pharisees sit in Moses' seat:
> All therefore whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do: but do not ye after their works: for they say, and do not.

I am wondering if we in Congress are going to be in the position of saying but doing not, for this bill is an emergency war power. It is an inflationary device. Those two facts cannot be successfully refuted. This was an emergency war power and has inflationary features. If there have been any emergency war powers repealed in this Congress, they have escaped my attention.

Mr. COLE of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUFFETT. I yield.

Mr. COLE of Kansas. Will the gentleman explain how it is an inflationary power?

Mr. BUFFETT. Yes; I am coming to that.

This bill would give the Federal Reserve System the right to buy up to $5,000,000,000 of bonds or Treasury notes and give the Treasury credit on its books. That makes possible fiat money inflation. That is exactly the same device that was used in Germany with their central bank during the great German inflation.

I have had people tell me that they were not going to worry about inflation until Government bond prices went down; yet, if you will look at history I think you will find that in Germany throughout their great inflation the price of Government bonds never went down. The Central Bank bought the Government bonds from the German treasury. They kept the bond right at par while inflation went into astronomical figures.

This bill would give our Treasury that same gadget for inflation that the Germans used. Only it is the Federal Reserve bank here and it was the Central Bank in Germany. So, this bill provides a straight-out inflationary device.

Mr. COLE of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BUFFETT. I yield.

Mr. COLE of Kansas. Based upon the history of the actions taken under the previous bill and based upon the limitations of the bill, would the gentleman think it would be very strongly inflationary?

Mr. BUFFETT. Indirectly, yes. It is like many other economic narcotics. It may be used a little and it will not hurt too much, but it is habit forming and self-accelerating.

It is an almost required piece of machinery for large-scale inflation. That was true when France had fiat money inflation a hundred and fifty years ago. They started by saying they were going to issue only $400,000,000 worth of assignats. They started with $400,000,000 but then went from issue to issue, with each issue promised as the last. This proposes only $5,000,000,000, but can you stop at that point? The smoldering fires of inflation are threatening our economic structure. You will recall the President's statement the other day when he said that the savings of the people were wiped out by inflation in Greece and that was the reason communism was a threat to Greece—the savings were wiped out.

Here we are being asked to pass a bill that is an inflationary device, that is a war-power device, that is a device that has been used in every inflation in history. To be sure, it is not the inflation itself because it is deficit spending that creates inflation. This simply makes it easy, makes it possible for the Government to quietly conceal the effects of inflation on the money markets.

This power might be compared to removing the brake from your automobile. You can take the brakes off your automobile and if you are a good driver you may possibly get by with it. But it is a dangerous idea, especially if your car is in the hands of drivers who have had a record of reckless driving.

Normally the Treasury goes into the open market and sell its bonds to investors. In that way the people of this country have a chance to appraise what the Treasury is doing. This gives the people a control of the Treasury's action. That is why we pointed out in the minority report that this power is a totalitarian device. It removes eventually from the people the power to pass judgment on the Treasury's borrowing.

As I say, this scheme is not inflation itself because it is just an inflationary accessory. And when not measured against the aggregate of other inflationary factors in our economics the bill by itself does not seem to be terribly important.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUFFETT. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. The bill we considered in the committee the other day had a provision relating to the construction of branch bank buildings. That is not in the present bill, is it?

Mr. BUFFETT. No; I believe not. I have not devoted my attention to that aspect of it, because to me the inflationary power involved is the important objective that we are dealing with.

In the paper yesterday I read where the price of gold in India is now $82, while our official price is $35. The price of gold in Egypt is $65 to $75 as against our legal price of $35. The price of gold in Palestine is $86 an ounce as compared to our price of $35.

Those prices of gold in other parts of the world indicate the deterioration of paper money that is taking place everywhere. That deterioration is reflected in the value of our currency throughout the world. That deterioration will be ultimately accentuated by the passage of any measure that makes inflation easier in this country.

There is no point in us going to the country again and again and saying that we are against inflation, and we are going to stop inflation, if we are going to set up for the Federal Reserve and the Treasury all the standard devices and all the machinery to bring about inflation in this country.

The effect, as you have been told, is that this is an overdraft arrangement. Well, we have been having overdrafts in this country now for 16 years, and it seems to me it is a good time to stop.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUFFETT. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Yet it should be emphasized that this is the classical method, the classical device, for uncontrolled inflation.

Mr. BUFFETT. Well, it is hard to get across at this stage of inflation just how tragic this process is.

I recently read an excerpt about a British experiment. It seems a scientific group took a frog and put him in a pan of cold water, and then they gradually warmed that water to a point where the frog was boiled to death, but at no point in that procedure did a change of temperature take place sharp enough so that the frog was disturbed to the point of jumping out of the water. Inflation in America proceeds along that pattern, and confirming signs have been evident for some time.

Conditions have been pleasant for the people of this country. Wheat yesterday reached $3 a bushel in Chicago. Now, the farmer may not worry very much about that, although we, as Members of Congress, probably will worry about it when we begin to hear from the city folks about the price of bread.

All the way across our country the people have lots of money, lots of savings in the bank, and we think they are in pretty good financial condition, so we have been gradually warmed up like the frog was. Congress has not reached a point where it is ready to jump out of this pan of hot water.

The reason we are not willing to jump out is that we have been politically comfortable during this process of a quiet inflation.

That is exactly what this bill is designed to continue. You can vote for it without disturbing your political peace of mind, but the time will come when you will rue the day. Adding to the distress of those of us who have tried to warn you of an ultimate economic Pearl Harbor will be our feeling of frustration at our inability to awaken our colleagues to the dangers ahead.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, notwithstanding the provisions of section 1501 of the Second War Powers Act, 1942, as amended, section 14 (b) of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended (U. S. C., 1940 edition, Supp. V, title 12, sec. 355), is hereby amended by striking out the proviso in such section 14 (b) and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Provided, That, notwithstanding any other provision of this act, (1) until July 1, 1950, any bonds, notes, or other obligations which are direct obligations of the United States or which are fully guaranteed by the United States as to principal and interest may be bought and sold without regard to maturities either in the open market or directly from or to the United States; but all such purchases and sales shall be made in accordance with the provisions of section 12A of this Act and the aggregate amount of such obligations acquired directly from the United States which is held at any one time by the 12 Federal Reserve banks shall not exceed $5,000,000,000; and (2) after June 30, 1950, any bonds, notes, or other obligations which are direct obligations of the United States or which are fully guaranteed by the United States as to principal and interest may be bought and sold without regard to maturities but only in the open market. The Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System shall include in their annual report to Congress detailed information with respect to direct purchases and sales from or to the United States under the provisions of the preceding proviso."

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. VAN ZANDT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 2413) to amend the Federal Reserve Act, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 148, he reported the bill back to the House.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SMITH of Ohio) there were—ayes 51, noes 11.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Obviously a quorum is not present.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 308, nays 55, not voting 69, as follows:

DISTRIBUTION AND PRICING OF SUGAR

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this time in order to announce to the Members of the House that we propose at this time to call up the rule on the so-called sugar bill. The bill was scheduled for consideration tomorrow, but in view of the fact that we have gotten along so well with the two bills that have been considered today it was thought that we could expedite the consideration and final determination of the measure tomorrow by proceeding with the adoption of the rule this evening.

I make this announcement only because this was not scheduled for today, but I am quite sure that no one could object to our proceeding with the adoption of the rule. I have discussed the matter with the minority leader, who expresses himself as in agreement with this procedure.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY UNION

Mr. EATON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Speaker, Senator BARKLEY will hold a meeting of those interested in the Interparliamentary Union in his Capitol office, which is the old robing room of the Supreme Court in the Capitol Building, at 10 o'clock Saturday morning. All interested in the Interparliamentary Union are cordially invited to be present. I may say there will be no collection taken.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BENNETT of Missouri and Mr. HÉBERT asked and were given permission to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BLAND (at the request of Mr. JACKSON of Washington) was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BROOKS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial On Dissolving the Draft.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include a letter of congratulation on the seventy-fifth anniversary of the East Boston Branch of the Boston Public Library, the oldest branch library in the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Tuesday next, at the conclusion of the legislative program of the day and following any special orders heretofore entered, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. AUCHINCLOSS] may be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

DISTRIBUTION AND PRICING OF SUGAR

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 149 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 146, to extend the powers and authorities under certain statutes with respect to the distribution and pricing of sugar, and for other purposes, and all points of order against the said joint resolution are hereby waived. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the joint resolution and continue not to exceed 3 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the joint resolution shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. It shall be in order to consider without the intervention of any point of order the substitute amendment recommended by the Committee on Banking and Currency now in the bill and such substitute for the purpose of amendment shall be considered under the 5-minute rule as an original bill. At the conclusion of such consideration, the Committee shall rise and report the joint resolution to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the joint resolution and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, the adoption of this resolution would make in order the immediate consideration of House Joint Resolution 146, to extend the powers and authorities under certain statutes with respect to the distribution and pricing of sugar, and for other purposes. Generally, this bill would transfer to the Secretary of Agriculture all controls on sugar. At present, the Government controls sugar through powers granted by four acts, all of which expire before July 1 of this year. The Emergency Price Control Act of 1942 and the Stabilization Act of 1942 both expire June 30, 1947. The provisions of title III of the Second War Powers Act of 1942 that relate to sugar and title 14 of that act will expire the last day of this month; and section 6 of the act of July 2, 1940, will expire on June 30 of this year. House Joint Resolution 146 would extend the sugar controls provided in these acts until October 31, 1947, with the right to exercise inventory controls until March 31, 1948.

There is also a provision in House Joint Resolution 146 for allocation of sugar to new businesses with no base period. Under existing law, sugar is allocated on the basis of the amount used in 1941. This regulation prevents new businesses from entering fields where sugar is necessary to their operation. In addition to providing for the sugar needs of these new enterprises with no base-period history, this joint resolution also instructs the Secretary of Agriculture to allocate sugar in hardship cases, especially where milk or other food products would be wasted unless sugar is made available to preserve them.

In reporting this joint resolution, the Committee on Banking and Currency pointed out that there might be excessive price increases if sugar controls were allowed to expire at this time. This might cause a serious dislocation of our economy, and hardship for many of our citizens. The subject of sugar is very technical. That you may be fully informed on the provisions and the need for House Joint Resolution 146, the Committee on Rules has provided 3 hours in which the chairman, the ranking minority member, and other members of the Banking and Currency Committee can explain the measure, and answer questions on its provisions. Time is an important factor in regard to this joint resolution as some of the powers which it extends would otherwise lapse at the end of this month. Therefore, the rule protects the measure from dilatory action by waiving points of order. Amendments may be offered under the 5-minute rule to the joint resolution as reported; any substitute amendment recommended by the Committee on Banking and Currency shall be considered as an original bill, and amendments to it may also be offered under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I am indeed gratified by this bill, and I want to congratulate the Committee on Banking and Currency which unanimously reported it. I am pleased because some of the gentlemen who are members of this committee and others used to charge that all of the legislation enacted by the so-called New Deal is bad and vicious.

In view of the present approval of these laws originally passed under a Democratic administration in the interest of the public, I congratulate the Republican gentlemen of the committee that they have seen fit to approve and extend this legislation as has been explained by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

This bill will extend price control on sugar to October 31, of this year, and inventory control to March 31, 1948. The committee recognized what might happen to prices and to supplies of sugar if this action were not taken. I think it is legislation in the right direction and were it not for the fact that there are 3 hours' general debate provided for under the rule, I would read extracts from the committee's report showing the necessity for this legislation.

As it is I will only point out that provision is made for the needs of hardship cases, for the needs of new users, and for those who have no base-period history.

I am glad that these exemptions have been made. Otherwise it might have been impossible to obtain sugar needed for home consumption.

Inevitably, the large sugar users would have taken advantage, as they always do, of the housewives. Under this bill housewives and home users will be protected, not only in obtaining sugar actually needed, but also in price. If this legislation were not adopted I fear that the price would again be boosted, as many others have been boosted by elimination of the OPA. Of course, this bill wipes out the last of OPA and transfers power and jurisdiction to the Secretary of Agriculture, who is a friend of agriculture and of consumers. I have faith that in his hands the best interests of our country will be protected and safeguarded.

WITHOUT OPA, PRICES WOULD BE FAR HIGHER

Price control under the Office of Price Administration did not function effectively in the last year. It was starved for funds, then emasculated last summer, and now murdered outright by cutting off all appropriations.

Nevertheless, all fair-minded men, and even some Republicans, concede that without its operation inflation would be much greater and prices would have soared much higher. In fact, ever since you came into power, the average cost of living has gone up and, especially, in the last 8½ months, it has risen nearly 60 percent. Consequently, the wage-earner's dollar buys at best one-half of what it did before your determination to destroy this legislation which protected the American consumer.

While in this bill you extend the distribution and price of sugar, you have failed to act upon an extension for housing and rent control. The propaganda by real estate operators and builders has tended to hide the rising cost of construction which has resulted in reducing the building of much needed housing for our veterans and many homeless families.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time. I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PROGRAM FOR NEXT WEEK

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK] tell us what the program will be for next week? If he can do so now, it would be a great accommodation to many Members. If not, tomorrow will be satisfactory.

Mr. HALLECK. I am not prepared to announce the full program for next week until tomorrow, but I can say that subject to action by the Ways and Means Committee tomorrow and subsequent action by the Rules Committee, it is our hope that the tax bill will be ready for consideration on the floor Wednesday and Thursday of next week.

PRESERVATION OF ROADLESS AREA IN SUPERIOR NATIONAL FOREST

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD regarding a bill I have introduced today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill which has as its purpose the preservation of the roadless area of the Superior National Forest in northern Minnesota as a permanent national heritage for ourselves and future generations. The bill authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture, acting through the United States Forest Service, to acquire private lands located within the region for the purpose of consolidating and preserving the remaining border natural forest and lake area as a primitive region for use as a wilderness canoe country.

The Minnesota border territory, famous throughout the country for its interlacing network of scenic canoe routes, is one of the last sizable regions in the United States where the natural attractions of lakes, streams, and forests still remain in a more or less primitive condition. This region is centrally located in the continent and accessible to all who seek rest and recreation in the wilderness. It lies in the Rainy Lake watershed, which embraces boundary lakes and forests in Cook, Lake, and St. Louis Counties in northern Minnesota.

The idea of preserving the natural features of this region for the perpetual use and enjoyment of the public has been the dream of conservationists and sportsmen for over 10 years. The project has the endorsement of the Izaak Walton League of America, the Quetico-Superior Council, the American Legion, the Minnesota Conservation Commission, the Minnesota Arrowhead Association, the regional council of the Boy Scouts of America, the county boards of Cook, Lake, and St. Louis Counties, as well as the fullest support of virtually every sportsman and conservation organization in the United States.

This program for consolidation and protection of the roadless areas is supported not only by the conservationists interested in preserving the natural features of the region for the public benefit, but by the great majority of the resort and business interests of Minnesota, who realize that the border wilderness country is their chief drawing card, and that if it is broken up by private developments it will be like killing the goose that lays the golden egg. Seldom has a project of this kind had such widespread and universal support and so little opposition.

Proponents of the project hope to see the establishment of a similar roadless area by the Government of Canada in the near future, thus merging the proposed Superior National Forest roadless area with the Quetico Park in Ontario into one great wilderness area. This would mean the conservation of a 10,000,000-acre roadless area as a great international forest for the enjoyment of both Canadians and Americans.

It has been proposed that this region, the Quetico-Superior Park, would stand as a fitting memorial to the servicemen of both countries who fought as comrades in both World War I and World War II. This suggestion has the approval of both the American Legion and the Canadian Legion.

Recent developments in northern Minnesota make it mandatory for the Congress to act at once if the dream of the roadless area is to be realized The project is endangered by the presence of a large number of private land tracts, including many lake-shore sites which are legally available for improvement and use as resorts, summer cabins, and other private purposes. Formerly the absence of roads in the area prevented such developments, but with the advent of air transport, resorts and summer cabins have been springing up like mushrooms in the roadless areas. Unless action is taken in the near future to preserve the region from commercial exploitation through Government acquisition of the unimproved lake-shore sites, the cost of acquisition will become so prohibitive as to end all hope of preserving or restoring the wilderness character of the territory. Thus it becomes imperative for the Eightieth Congress to proceed without delay to acquire the unimproved private holdings so as to prevent further development.

The bill which I have introduced today to speed the establishment of the roadless area has the approval of the United States Forest Service, the Minnesota Conservation Commission, and a committee representing the three Minnesota counties affected by the project, namely, St. Louis, Cook and Lake Counties. This bill contains three major provisions:

First, it authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture, acting through the United States Forest Service, to acquire the undeveloped private land in the interior of the present roadless areas of the Superior National Forest, while reserving the outer fringe of the region for private development. Under the bill, resorts and other improved real estate in contiguous tracts not exceeding 500 acres and bearing permanent structures suitable for human occupancy at the time of the passage of the act are exempt from condemnation. The bill calls for annual appropriations out of a total authorization of $500,000 for the purchase of condemned land.

Second, the bill authorizes the exchange of private land holdings within the roadless areas for Government-owned land located just outside the proposed roadless areas which can be used for resort development. Some of the owners of developed properties have already expressed willingness to sell or trade such properties to the Government.

And third, the bill provides for the payment of adequate compensation by the Federal Government to the counties in lieu of taxes lost on Government-owned land at an annual rate of 12 cents per acre.

The purpose of this bill, Mr. Speaker, is to preserve the wilderness character of this region and its pristine resources of lakes, streams, forests and wildlife for the benefit of all Americans. It is not a partisan proposal, but is one which will receive the most favorable reaction from those of both political parties and from all men and women who love the great outdoors. It is in a spirit of nonpartisanship that I submit this bill for the consideration of the Congress.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. KEARNS, for March 21 and March 22, on account of labor investigation.

To Mr. HUBER, indefinitely, on account of investigation of Veterans' Administration hospital.

To Mr. BLAND (at the request of Mr. DREWRY), indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. MACKINNON, March 21, 1947, on account of official business.

SESSION OF THE COMMITTEE ON WORLD WAR VETERANS' LEGISLATION

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation be allowed to sit during the session of the House during general debate on Friday and Monday and Tuesday of next week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. REED of New York asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. VURSELL] is recognized for 30 minutes.

FINANCIAL AID TO GREECE AND TURKEY

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, the President's request to the Congress that the United States Government extend additional financial aid to Greece and Turkey in the amount of $400,000,000 and the further suggestion that we send military experts for the training and direction of the rebuilding of the Greek Army, that we send business advisers to help plan and direct the reconstruction and financial direction of Greece, presents to the Congress and the American people one of the most far-reaching and momentous problems ever to be considered by this Nation. His recommendation that we take over the responsibility of the British Government to protect a part of the Balkan countries and the Middle East against the further inroads of communism may well be termed the greatest gamble in international affairs that has ever been seriously considered by the American people.

For the past number of years we have had one crisis after another on the home front. Then came the crisis leading to the great world war. Before the close of the war America and its allies throughout the world began making preparation for universal peace through helping to establish the United Nations organization. The American people and the peace-loving people of the world were told that this was a war to overthrow dictators, end all wars, and that this organization would usher in a new era of peace.

The people of America have been pinning their hopes on world peace in the future. Now we are confronted by the action of the President in his message to the Congress with another international crisis with an expansion and change of our international policy that causes deep concern to the American people.

It is most unfortunate that in this crisis which may mean so much to the American people, that the cry of great haste is asked of the Congress, the Members of which are the representatives of the American people who, in the last analysis, are the sovereign power in this Republic of ours.

It is my candid opinion that before we take this step on a road from which we cannot turn back once we are committed, that this momentous question should be debated in both Houses of the Congress, giving time for the representatives of the people through the press to fully inform the public as to all of the implications and responsibilities we are about to assume. The public should have time to become fully informed so that they, who will pay the taxes and who will have to furnish the manpower to carry out such a policy if war comes, may be able to learn all of the facts and make their wishes known to their representatives here in Washington.

Mr. Speaker, it would seem to me that the United Nations organization, which has been set up for the purpose of promoting world peace and considering such questions as have arisen with reference to Greece in particular and Turkey, is the proper forum to which this matter should have been brought before this Government was called upon to take such a step. Certainly the power for peace contained in the 50 nations which have signed a solemn world compact to deal with such problems, should first have an opportunity to bring the moral force and power of the world into action in an effort to stop the Russian Government from its threat and encroachment against Turkey and Greece, and against any other countries. The move we are asked to make is a unilateral action against the policy of the United Nations. It gives Russia, that ruthless and dictatorial nation, the very propaganda it needs to inflame the minds of the Russian people. Out of such a move on our part Russian leaders will falsely seek to convince the Russian people that the policy of the United States Government is one of imperialism, that we seek in cooperation with Great Britain to encircle and cut off from the outside world, the opportunities of commerce and business for the Russian people. It will help that dictatorial government to wield a greater control over her people and doubtless they will make them believe that we are preparing for a war of aggression and conquest against them.

One of the great hopes for peace was to eventually, through peaceful efforts, raise or penetrate the iron curtain surrounding Russia so that the Russian people might get a glimpse of the prosperity and happiness of a free people which would ultimately cause them to change their form of government to a democracy of liberty and progress. This is one of the great opportunities for peace that may be thwarted by such a move.

Mr. Speaker, the First World War was fought to extend democracy to the world. The Second World War was fought to extend the principles of the Atlantic Charter which provided that all nations might have the type of government their peoples wanted without interference or control from more powerful nations. It was fought to end all wars in the future. The people of America spent over $400,000,000,000 and carried the major burden that brought victory to the Allies, and in addition there was the loss that can never be repaid of the lives of 300,000 of our finest young men in arms with 1,000,000 American soldiers wounded, many of whom will need financial aid for the rest of their lives from our Government.

It will yet cost this Government, it is estimated, $300,000,000,000 since VJ-day by the time we have rendered such governmental aid as we will render to the returning veterans throughout the future. It has brought to us a debt of $260,000,000,000. The people of America may well ask the question "where is this illusive 'pot of gold' we have been seeking—'Peace'—at the end of the rainbow?"

The Members of Congress will want clear and definite answers to many serious questions before we are compelled to make a decision. This is no time for haste.

Mr. Speaker, as a practical proposition, can we stop the expansion of Russia into the Middle East by expending $400,000,000 in Greece and Turkey? Times have changed with the centuries, yet the best yardstick we can call upon is to try to judge the future by the past. What light will this throw upon the subject? We gave to Russia through lend-lease about $11,000,000,000, yet Russia has shown no gratitude toward our country.

To France since VJ-day we have given through lend-lease $411,500,000 worth of goods. We have given a line of credit to France through the Export-Import Bank of $650,000,000. In addition to helping to liberate France, our gifts and credit to them are over $1,500,000,000. Has this stopped the inroads of communism in France? It has not. France today is controlled and operated by Communist officials elected by the people. The newspapers of France today, after all we have done for France in two wars, cry out against the policies of the United States Government and praise the policies of the Communist government of Russia. We have given over $500,000,000 to Italy and today Italy is largely in control of the Communist organization. We have given countless millions to Yugoslavia and in return the Dictator Tito, schooled in communism in Russia, proudly told the world that he gave orders to shoot down friendly American airmen who lost their way in flying over his country.

Since VJ-day we shipped relief amounting to $744,493,578 to China. Our total lend-lease to China was $1,543,385,795. And in a further effort to bring the warring factions of China together our Government sent General Marshall to China, where he worked and extended his great power and intellect in the name of our Government to try to bring the Chinese factions together. He gave up the job, failed through no fault of his or our Government, came home, and was later appointed Secretary of State.

Mr. Speaker, in addition to this we gave millions to Poland, Rumania, Bulgaria, and other countries, all of which took our money and lined up with the Russian Government. With all we have done we now receive but little thanks from all of the governments I have named.

Now, in the face of this record, can we stop the encroachment of the Russian Government upon Greece and Turkey with a donation of $400,000,000?

Great Britain has spent close to $1,000,000,000 in helping to liberate Greece, of which over $500,000,000 has been given that country since the close of the war. The United States extended to this little country of Greece $81,562,000 in lend-lease. Through UNRRA, of which the United States paid 72 percent or more on each dollar, Greece was given aid to the extent of $358,000,000. Through surplus property since the war we gave Greece over $20,000,000, and through the Export-Import Bank we have extended a loan or a line of credit of $25,000,000, and $100,000,000 more is being considered as a loan or gift.

In addition to this the Greek people, through the United States and other people in this country who are always anxious to help suffering humanity, were sent millions of dollars in gifts and money to the Greek people. This total that we know of amounts to over $485,000,000 from our Government.

Mr. Speaker, the Congress will want the answer to this question. If we approve the President's request, is it tantamount to establishing an American military beachhead in the countries of Greece and Turkey, 3,000 miles away, which we propose to defend by military force if necessary? It appears to me that if Russia continues on her ruthless unjustified course, nothing can stop her from going into the Middle East except soldiers armed and equipped to hold her back.

Mr. Speaker, the American people ought to be told what this step in our international policy means because if it provokes war it will be up to them to furnish the equipment, the money, and the manpower to man this beachhead and to try to stop communism on its march into the Middle East.

Another question: By this policy are we committed throughout the world to render such aid to all countries in the future against Communist expansion?

Can we finance and will we furnish the soldiers to do it?

Mr. Speaker, another question of tremendous importance, it seems to me, is, can we continue to finance the world at the rate we have been going without dragging the 140,000,000 American people down into abject poverty?

Much as we resent and deplore the unfair advantage the Russian Government has taken against nations along her border, do we not owe our first obligation to the American people?

The cost of living in America has increased 50 percent within the past year. The reason is that our own Government, through the Commodity Credit Corporation, has been in all of the grain markets and every other market buying up the wheat, corn, meats, fats, oils, shipping and giving them away to other countries. We read in the Sunday paper that bread here in Washington is being raised from 1 to 3 cents a loaf. Wheat recently reached an all-time high of $3 a bushel, corn at $1.74¼, and Mr. Anderson, Secretary of Agriculture, comes out with a statement that while they have been buying wheat and food stuffs in the United States market through the Commodity Credit Corporation, we do not have any more grain than we need for our shipping program abroad. Richard Ullman, first vice president of the Board of Trade in Chicago, says:

> There would be no scarcity of wheat and prices would not reach the high levels they are except for the fact that the Government is pushing exports to the limit of transportation facilities. The Government statistics show that in the 8 months ending February 1947, export shipments abroad amounted to 299,417,000 bushels of grain and that the Government will continue to buy, raising these prices against the American consumer and ship the grain of this country abroad, largely giving it away freely to the other nations.

President Truman, in his message recommending the Greek loan, said:

> Inflation has wiped out practically all savings in Greece.

May I say, if we continue as we have during the past 2 years to buy up through the United States Treasury the grain and food productions of the Nation, giving them away along with millions of dollars worth of industrial equipment, inflation will be accelerated until President Truman or some other President may later say, "inflation has practically wiped out the savings of the American people."

Mr. Speaker, in fact, the President, in total, has asked for the expenditure of $1,500,000,000 during the next 18 months to be used for relief abroad.

If the price of living keeps going up, wage earners will strike for higher wages. Inflation is more dangerous to the American people today than it has been at any time in the past 5 years. This inflation and the rise in the cost of living has not come about by lifting OPA controls. It has been brought upon all of the people by the Government buying up the foodstuffs in America to give away abroad. While we want to do what we can to help the distressed people of the world, there is a limit to our ability. The most important service we can render the American people is to keep this Government sound financially. And, if we can keep it sound financially, we can render the world our greatest service. That is the No. 1 basic problem upon which all else depends.

Mr. Speaker, already we note in the press that other nations will renew their requests for help. Iran, Syria, Lebanon, Hungary, and Palestine will soon likely call for many millions each. Where will it all end? Our first regard must be for the American people. The problem we are facing is to great and dangerous to be influenced in any way by any political color. What we do will affect every man, woman, and child living in America today and the millions who will follow after us. We must find the right answer to the question if possible. Each of us will have to be responsible to the American people and to our own conscience. For my part I would prefer this matter be taken with all the force and power of the American Government to the United Nations organization in the hope that this instrument set-up to deal with these problems has advanced to the point, and I believe it has, where its great moral force might well be sufficient in the interest of world peace to not only stop the aggression of Russia toward the Middle East but toward the other nations of the world.

Mr. Speaker, after all of the sacrifice and struggle the American people have made, they have turned their faces toward peace through the United Nations. Our people, with the war over, had hoped for greater production, a reduction of the cost of living, a reduction in taxes, and a reduction of the national debt. It is very doubtful if we can follow the President's proposal and bring to our people such relief. At any rate, we need further information from the President before we make the decision. The people are entitled to know how long is the road we shall have to travel and how steep is the way.

The people will want to know if it is our policy to go into Greece and Turkey and protect them; are we committed to a policy of going into every country where a like situation arises throughout the world? They are entitled to know how far flung are our commitments of this new and expanded international policy laid down by the President.

Mr. Speaker, because of mistakes and bad leadership in the immediate past, we are confronted with this crisis. The mistakes at Teheran, the appeasement at Yalta, the appeasement and mistakes of our leaders at Potsdam, the mistakes of an earlier appeasement policy have brought us to this crisis. Can we make this move in the record of the past with any certainty that those who advise it are right this time?

We were told that the United Nations would bring us peace for the future, that it would do away with dividing nations into spheres of influence; that when the peace of the world was threatened that such matters would be brought before the Council of the United Nations where the moral forces of this world membership would settle such differences and stop wars before they started; we were told it would stop unilateral agreements, yet, in the face of these promises and the world policy laid down, the President's move enters into unilateral agreements, bypasses the United Nations organization, the court to which such matters were to be brought and establishes a policy that the United States Government will assume the functions of a peace-maker and we can assume that the President proposes to back up such expanded international policy with force, if necessary.

Mr. Speaker, unless prohibitions and safeguards can be written into the Act by amendments that will greatly lessen our obligations and give a greater protection to the people of this Nation when we consider this legislation, I cannot permit my conscience to commit the American people to such a vast and dangerous undertaking. In these serious times we all want to go as far as we can to uphold the hands of the President and our international representatives. No one in the Congress has less faith in, or more greatly detests the Russian Government on its record than I, but I must not let my opposition to that dictatorial government lead me to the point where I will endanger the best interest of the people of the United States. We must have more information before a final decision can be made in the interest of the Nation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. McDONOUGH). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HORAN] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include certain newspaper articles.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

PUBLIC ASSISTANCE EXPENDITURES

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, last Monday one of the local papers took me to task for my efforts to have District of Columbia relief abuses corrected. In doing so they inadvertently pointed out what undoubtedly was a national fault; that is, the abuse of the whole system of social security, public welfare, and general relief throughout the Nation.

Monday's article apparently tried to discount my efforts to have the National Capital relief picture corrected. They sought to do so by pointing out what is going on in my own home State. Naturally, I carry no brief for the abuses of welfare grants anywhere in the Nation. To do so would be to undermine the very security of those who honestly and actually need relief; to do so would be to deny what I believe is a perfectly obvious fact that our entire social security and expenditures picture needs a complete, thorough, drastic, and honest overhauling.

The Washington Daily News last Monday stated:

> Figures show that Representative HORAN's own State, Washington, is far more generous than the District in public-assistance outlay. It's near the top of the list of the 48 States, Hawaii, Alaska, and the District, both in amounts of public-assistance checks and in numbers of beneficiaries.

I am glad that this article was run for it gives me an opportunity to show what the good people of the State of Washington are discussing with regard to these same abuses. I am only sorry that the Washington Daily News saw fit, apparently, to condone such abuses in the District of Columbia.

The District, or Washington, D. C., or just plain Washington should be a proud city—for it is the capital of the greatest nation ever known.

Yet, apparently, some would demand it become the bellwether for despair, the chanticleer of chaos.

Yesterday it was reported that there were 25,000 unemployed within the spare 70 square miles that comprises the District—Washington, D. C.—the Nation's Capital—the should-be-proud city—the same area that saw action a few days ago to import labor to the Nation.

It is about time that we heard from the "grass roots," or, as some would say, from the "local levels."

I do hope that my efforts to correct this problem in the District of Columbia will extend throughout the Nation and be particularly of material assistance to the people of the good State of Washington. The generosity of a democratic people must not be abused, for abuse means eventual denial of relief and succor to those who truly need assistance. It is the duty of us who represent the people of the United States to correct these abuses. At the same time social security should be expanded to protect, assure, and benefit the loyal public servants of State, county, and municipal, or district government bodies throughout the Nation. That is a cardinal reason for clarifying and correcting the whole social security, welfare, and relief picture.

These expenditures simply cannot be considered separately. Annuities, pensions, relief, assistance, grants-in-aid—whatever they may be called—they all come out of the total national income. They are a lien upon the total national credit.

Mr. Speaker, the abuse of these costs in many categories constitutes one of the largest items of national waste prevalent today. This is particularly true of direct relief. Public assistance—or, better, "relief racket" subsidized with Government appropriations—is a flourishing business in this Nation. Ironically enough, it is carefully disguised as a needful item for Government expense to ease human want and suffering in this present hour because of vast and ever-increasing unemployment. This, we are told, Mr. Speaker, by the professional administrators of public relief even in the face of the fact that Congress broke the budget only a couple of weeks ago when it added $10,000,000 to the national expenditure to provide for the induction of foreign labor to offset an established critical labor shortage in agriculture. One naturally wonders what will happen with bad times.

Last week, Mr. Speaker, I called the attention of this House to a deplorable condition existing in the District of Columbia. The alarming increase of public aid in the National City over the past 10 years came to light before the Subcommittee on Appropriations when hearings were held to justify a deficiency appropriation for $184,200 requested by the District Board of Public Welfare. But, Mr. Speaker, this is not a matter related only to the District of Columbia. Relief costs and larger requested appropriations from public revenues are being reported from every section of the country. The article in Monday's News might more constructively have outlined and deplored this dangerous situation. In my own home county—the county of Chelan in the State of Washington—the monthly expenditures have nearly doubled since January 1945. In January of this present year the relief costs for that 1 month—in an area with a population of less than 36,500—reached the preposterous figure of $106,307.80.

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, in the county of Chelan it is becoming increasingly popular to get on the public-assistance rolls. But neither is Chelan County in the State of Washington an isolated situation. What pertains to the District of Columbia and my own home district is reflected in every city, county, and State in the Nation where Federal funds are employed to match local moneys in supporting an indigent population which has learned to depend upon public funds rather than resort to even a minimum effort for themselves.

By the same token those who have a just right to look to the whole justifiable fabric of social security for support are menaced. The proponents and advocates of larger appropriations for public assistance in the District of Columbia have indicated their belief that my interest in this matter is only to curtail the public and Federal expenditure in the District of Columbia. The article in the Monday News indicates this. Heaven protect us from a race among the States to outdo one another in such expenditures.

For clarification of the record on this question, I want to insert here as part of my remarks, a series of articles appearing in the Wenatchee (Wash.) Daily World recently. Wenatchee is the county seat of Chelan County. Wenatchee is my home community—it is "grass roots" to the core—and I strongly feel that its thinking has a lesson that this Nation's capital can wisely heed if we would pose as an example to others. This is an enlightening series which shows that in my own district the present system of providing a way of life through the wanton use of public moneys works no hardship on the person who wants to be unemployed—no hardship anywhere except that worked upon the taxpayers who support the show. Nor is Chelan County the only county afflicted in the Nation.

No, Mr. Speaker, this is not an isolated matter for concern; it is fast becoming a national scandal when employable United States citizens in a time of rich employment opportunity and in a period of unusually high private income, can find it advantageous because of laxity in the provision for proper legislation enabling efficient administration of necessary public assistance, to "go on relief." I repeat, Mr. Speaker, the conviction I expressed in an address before this House on Thursday of last week—the Nation expects us as we deal with problems of returning sanity to our Government's fiscal spending to provide adequate legislation covering the administration of public assistance and relief through federally appropriated moneys, legislation that shall affect the operation from the national level down to the very last administrative effort on the local and, I feel, in this instance, the most effectual plane.

Certainly, every community, as is true with the District of Columbia, wants new roads, improved highways, modernizing construction, and other public expenditures. Certainly if we are to achieve these, we must abolish all waste and correct, as well as we can, all of the abuses that attend the privileges of freedom. The articles follow:

LAND OF MILK AND HONEY—RELIEF CASH PLENTIFUL IN STATE OF WASHINGTON

(By Howard Ordway)

One out of four residents of the State of Washington is on relief.

Right now, during prosperous times, three of every four work for a living and support the fourth person who depends on his neighbors, through taxation, for his livelihood. Relief costs in the State have doubled.

The real problem for the present session of the legislature is to find the money necessary to meet the expenses for the young and the older citizens, for education, and social security.

Relief costs in the State have increased from $67,000,000 in 1941–43 to $108,000,000 in 1945–47—and even this amount was not sufficient. A deficiency appropriation of $11,000,000 was necessary for social security expenditures during 1945–47. The house committee on social security now recommends $5,000,000 increase for 1947–49 bringing the total cost for social security to $128,000,000.

The cost per capita for relief cases is $20.83. All this has happened in this State when the experience of other States throughout the country report per capita costs as low as $2 because of good times and peak employment.

Oregon spent in 1943–45 biennium $12,000,000.

The present situation raises many questions. Are all these senior citizens our citizens; are there abuses to the administration of the social-security laws; do they require amendment; is the program established on the basis of need and the promotion of rehabilitation of the recipients of social-security aid?

How will continued increases in costs for social security affect appropriations for schools and highways; are we becoming a State of indigents; will it deter industry from coming to our State because of the necessity of increasing taxes to support the program?

Because of the necessity and responsibility toward our senior citizens in providing adequate financial aid, a survey has been made of the present social-security laws, their application and administration, together with case histories revealing abuses, which, if not corrected by administration and amendment to the present laws, could jeopardize not only the rightful aid to the senior citizens but the economy and fiscal standing of the State.

A slogan is now being heard these days in the legislative halls and cloak rooms at Olympia—"60 at 60."

At present what do the social-security laws provide for our senior citizens in payments for old age assistance and general assistance? What is the nature of the senior citizen grants, who can qualify, what are the requirements, and how liberal are the State laws?

In the language of the laws of 1945 which became effective May 1, 1945, we learn the legislature's declaration of intent.

"On no other issue are the people of the State of Washington, as well as our Nation, as united as they are in recognition of the economic and social necessity of returning to our senior citizens, the fathers and mothers of our country, part of the wealth which their labor helped to create."

"It is simple justice that our Government," the law continues, "which owes its industrial construction, its farms, its factories, its entire wealth in fact, to the labor of its pioneers, should provide as an obligation and not as charity, some measure of security to the pioneers."

And just what is a senior citizen, does he have to be a citizen of the State or of the United States? According to the legal definition, he or she is not required to be a citizen of the country or State.

"Senior citizen," the definition reads, "shall mean a person eligible for a grant under the terms of this act, and shall not be construed as limiting eligibility for grants to citizens of the United States or the State of Washington."

If he doesn't have to be a citizen, then how long must he be in residence in the State before he is eligible for grants in aid, either general assistance or old age assistance?

As to the old age assistance, the law reads, "Senior citizen grants shall be awarded to any person who is without resources who: * * * (c) has been a resident of the State of Washington for at least 5 years within the last 10."

Recipients of general assistance (aid for persons regardless of age) are required only to prove they are "without resources to provide himself and dependents with food, clothing, shelter, and such other items as are necessary to afford a reasonable subsistence."

Are the recipients of public assistance from the county and State required to live within the State of Washington? Here is what the law says in this respect.

"Recipients of Federal aid assistance whose welfare will be furthered by temporary residence outside the State may continue to receive public assistance grants from the State if they are still in need."

Just how much money does a senior citizen secure under the present laws? Does he or she lose if food prices and rent increase.

The law read., "such grant when added to his income shall equal not less than $50 per month. In order to determine a senior citizen's need, the department shall establish objective budgetary guides based upon actual living costs studies of the items in the budget.

"Such living costs studies shall be renewed or revised at least once a year; and whenever there is a change of 5 percent or more (5%) in the cost of any of the items of the budget common to any category of senior citizens such change shall be reflected in the determination of his need."

How about the incidental expenses, say for medical, dental, surgical, hospital, or doctor's care? Who pays for hearing aids and other needed appliances, and do the payments for such items come out of the senior citizen grants? The law says no, they are extra expenses, provided for under section 15 of chapter 7, Laws of 1945, which reads as follows:

"In addition to senior citizen grants, the department shall provide for those eligible medical, dental, surgical, optical, hospital, and nursing care by a doctor of recipient's own choosing; and shall also provide artificial limbs, eyes, hearing aids, and other needed appliances."

When the law speaks about general assistance aid, what does the term embrace? The laws are specific and all-inclusive, "general assistance within the meaning of this section shall include hospital, institutional, and medical care excluding tuberculosis hospitalization." The word "assistance" is defined as "public aid to persons in need thereof for any cause, and shall include services, direct relief, work relief, medical and institutional care."

And what does direct relief involve? "Payment by cash or voucher to provide the necessities of life to a person and his dependents, and shall include materials furnished or services rendered for such purpose to such person and dependent in his own home."

The term "work relief" the law reads, "shall mean wages paid by a body politic or corporate to persons who are unemployed, or whose employment is inadequate to provide the necessities of life to themselves and dependents, out of money specifically appropriated or contributed for the purpose, for the performance of services or labor connected with the work undertaken by such body independent of work under contract or for which an annual appropriation is made: Provided, That the expenditure of moneys made available for assistance purposes under this act in connection with work relief programs shall be limited to the payment of wages exclusively."

RIGID RELIEF LAWS IMPOSE STRICT CENSORSHIP OF WELFARE EXPENDITURES

(This is the second in a series of articles on the problems confronting this State by reason of abuses practiced under the social-security laws.)

(By Howard Ordway)

The crux of the whole relief picture so far as the county is concerned can be summed up as follows:

1. The county is charged with the responsibility for relief, including old-age pensions and general assistance, and must raise money through a 2-mill tax levy, but they have no control over expenditures—this is exclusively a State function under air tight legal provisions which prevent the taxpayers or county learning where the money goes.

2. County officials emphasize that Washington, unlike other Western States, has no 3-year resident requirement for recipients of relief—hence the county is saddled with a tremendous burden of numerous out-of-State residents who get on the relief rolls immediately upon arrival here.

Here is what an analysis of the State social-security laws reveals regarding the provisions for county responsibility and State control of expenditures.

"The care, support, and relief of needy persons is hereby declared to be a joint Federal State, and county function," the law states. "The several counties of the State are hereby charged with the responsibility, by and through their respective board of county commissioners, for the administration of public assistance to such persons; but they shall be subject to State supervision as in this act provided."

The law also says: "The county commissioners of each county in the State, in order to carry out their responsibility under this act shall establish a county welfare department which shall have full charge of administration of public assistance within the county. The welfare department shall be in charge of a county administrator who shall be appointed by the county commissioners in accordance with the rules and regulation of the merit system."

State dictates

And as for the money to carry out their share of the bill for public assistance, the law reads, "the State hereby undertakes to make available to the counties from State and Federal funds sufficient moneys to enable the counties to discharge their responsibility with respect to Federal-aid assistance; while the respective counties shall provide funds by means of the county tax, hereinafter required to be levied, to discharge their responsibility for general assistance."

As for the levying of the county tax, it works this way: "It shall be the duty of the Board of County Commissioners of each county in the State to submit to the department, and through the department to the committee, a county plan which shall include:

"'An agreement to make available for assistance purposes a sum equal to a two mill tax levy upon the assessed valuation of its taxable property, together with such miscellaneous revenues as may accrue to the county through the operation of public assistance programs, and to apply such moneys in accordance with uniform standards prescribed by the department and submit quarterly reports of all expenditures for such assistance purposes within the county.

"'Disbursements of moneys in such account shall be made primarily for general assistance purposes and shall conform to the uniform standards established as specified in this act.'

"In the event that any county in the State does not for general-assistance purpose require the sum assessed as provided in this section, taken in conjunction with revenues accruing to the county from the administration of public-assistance program, it shall be authorized, by resolution of the board of commissioners to release the amount of the overplus, or such portion thereof as may be deemed expedient by said board of county commissioners, from the assistance account to the current expense for general county purposes."

What is the basis for the State allocating moneys to the county for public-assistance purposes?

"The moneys appropriated for public-assistance purposes and subject to allocation as in this act provided shall be allocated to counties on the basis of past experience and established load history."

Are there any strings tied to how the county can spend the moneys for general assistance under this act?

"In the administration of general assistance under this act, county administrators shall insofar as possible grant work relief to unemployed employables and confine direct relief to those persons who by reason of bodily or mental infirmity, or other cause, are incapacitated from gainful employment."

Censorship

Have the taxpayers access to the records of senior-citizen grants and case studies which would indicate how their money is being spent?

The law is very specific and imposes a strict control which amounts to censorship of all records. Here is what the law states:

"All applications and income records concerning any applicant shall be confidential and shall be open to inspection only by persons duly authorized by the State or the United States in connection with their official duties: Provided, That this shall not be construed as interfering with the right of applicant or his attorney or authorized agent from examining such records when applicant's case is on appeal as provided above."

"It shall be unlawful," section 5, chapter 128 of laws of 1941 states, "except for purposes directly connected with the administration of general assistance, old-age assistance, aid to the blind, and aid to dependent children and in accordance with the rules and regulations of the State Department of social security for any person or persons to solicit, disclose, receive, make use of, or to authorize, knowingly permit, participate in, or to acquiesce in the use of, any list, or names of, or any information concerning, persons applying for, or receiving such assistance, directly or indirectly derived from the records, papers, files, or communications of the State or county or subdivisions or agencies thereof or acquired in the course of the performance of official duties."

And what happens if there is such a disclosure or leak of official information by employees of the Social Security department? The laws have provided for that too: "Any violation, or attempted violation or evasion of the provisions of this act by any official or employee of the Department or of its agencies shall constitute a felony, and shall disqualify such official or employee from further employment in the Department or any of its agencies."

Summarizing, the State of Washington laws on public welfare and old-age assistance provide the following:

1. Recipients of senior citizen grants (old-age assistance) and general assistance are not required to be citizens of the State of Washington or of the United Stafes or in residence within the State.

2. Senior citizen grants begin at $50 a month. In addition to the monthly payments, additional expenses for medical, dental, surgical, hospital, and other necessary appliances are paid by the State.

3. The board of county commissioners assess a 2-mill-tax levy upon assessed taxable property within the county to carry on the public-assistance program.

4. Direct relief by the county should be confined to those persons who by reason of bodily or mental infirmity or other causes are incapacitated from gainful employment.

5. All records and applications for old-age and general assistance are classified confidential and only State and Federal officials and employees can study them or have access to the information. Any violation of this provision by a social-security employee is considered a felony and results in disqualifying the official or employee from further employment.

6. The basis for the State allocating moneys to the county for public-assistance purposes is solely on past experience and established load history.

7. Public-welfare laws and those governing old-age assistance make no provision for rehabilitation of the recipient.

8. The State of Washington is the only State in the United States that does not require a 3-year residence of the recipient in the State prior to granting either general assistance or old-age pensions.

I might comment here that Mr. Joe Lester, of Wenatchee, Wash., represents one of those high type public officials whom the American system so often places at the top of local government. This is one more reason why I feel that in many ways the eventual and the dominant responsibility should rest with those in charge of local government.

The following article deals with a bill then before the State legislature. It would allow for a complete system of local control. Such a control should encompass a simple coordination of all local bodies—the assessor's office, penal institutions, and employment agencies of all kinds. Such a local control could also set up an honor system capable of placing the eventual responsibilities with those eligible to receive aid.

WHERE DO THE RELIEF DOLLARS GO?—COUNTY IS RESPONSIBLE, BUT THE STATE HAS CONTROL

(By Howard Ordway)

"Under the present social-security laws," former County Commissioner Joe Lester reveals, "the county is in a difficult and untenable situation—it has responsibility for relief and must raise money, but cannot control the expenditures."

"The job was, and remains, increasing difficult," Lester said, "because of two reasons, both of them stemming from the social-security laws.

"1. All of the Western States, except Washington, require that the recipient live in the State 3 years before he is eligible. In this State, however, a person can come into Chelan County at 11 a. m. and secure relief by 11:05 a. m.—just a simple oral questioning is all that is necessary—no red tape, investigations, or proof of need is required.

"2. If the county objects to payment of a voucher for either general assistance or an old-age pension, the social-security office simply forwards it to the State where it is promptly paid—using county and State money."

In a recent address before the legislative affairs committee of the local chamber of commerce former Commissioner Joe Lester outlined the public-assistance provisions of the social-security program. Lester advanced many cogent reasons for amending the present social-security laws and correcting the abuses through better administration.

Lester told the committee: "Under the present law the county commissioners are responsible for the relief of the poor. All of our activity and administration is subject to the rules and regulations set forth by the State social-security department.

"At our 1945 legislature," Lester continued, "the law was passed increasing the floor on all recipients to a minimum of $50 a month. This means that the recipient may come in and ask for $30 a month for 3 months saying that he could get by after that period," Lester said.

"But under the present law," Lester explained to the chamber of commerce committee, "even though the recipient only needed $30, he would have to accept $50 a month to become a legal recipient. In other words, gentlemen, the program is not set up on the basis of need and does not promote the rehabilitation of the recipient," Lester said.

Lester cited many cases that Chelan county has had in past 2 years where people have moved into the State and accepted relief permanently in a few short days after they had arrived. "With a 3-year resident law," Lester said, "we could buy a railroad ticket for these families and send them back where they came from—saving the county thousands and thousands of dollars.

"Here is how a typical case works," Lester said.

"We have people coming to Chelan County, possibly with a slight heart ailment or asthma or such a condition and immediately securing relief. We had one case," Lester continued, "where a man had asthma and secured a medical statement saying that he could not work. With four children in the family, the county is paying as high as $278 a month, including medical and hospital services.

"He sold his property," Lester continued, "in one section of the country and received some $1,950, dissipated the money, and immediately got back on relief. He moved to Kitsap County. After 2 or 3 months he moved to Arizona, bought a home in Arizona, and continued to receive this monthly remittance from the State of Washington—that is, Chelan County, too, for we assist the State through a 2-mill levy on all taxable property in the county. If you don't think that amounts to a tidy sum, remember our tax levy for all current expenses in 1947 is only 2.7162 mills," Lester said.

Lester continued, "This man would be eligible for that fund for 3 years or until he established his residence in Arizona. This is not an isolated case, gentlemen, we are squandering thousands upon thousands of dollars each year on just such cases."

In concluding his remarks, Lester said, "I urge that every responsible citizen and businessman in Chelan county write to his legislators and try to get their approval for amending the present social security laws, returning the control to local authorities."

As for the social security law amendments, Lester said he favored House bill 395, presented by Representatives Ball and Gehrman, which establishes a State Department of Public Welfare Board.

"This board will consist of seven members, six to be appointed by the governor, with the consent of the Senate, to represent labor, business, medical and legal professions which in intent is to be non-political, three from each party. It limits the service of any member not to exceed two terms," Lester said.

Lester said the proposed bill creates in each county welfare department, a county board of public welfare to consist of one county commissioner and two persons to be appointed by the State Board of Public Welfare. Not more than two members of the board will be of the same political party of the county appointments. "One of the two appointees," Lester said, "should represent labor and the other, business."

The former county commissioner, in his considered opinion, thought the bill had many desirable features, although the weak point was that it failed to include a 3-year resident provision. He explained his support in this manner:

"This bill would bring back county control, in reality, grass-roots control of policies and administration of the relief program. One of the reasons this bill is so constructed is that we have too many individuals coming into the county and securing relief without previous residence and then leaving shortly after, still continuing to secure their checks from us while they live in another State. It decentralizes the relief problem down to the local people who best know their own situation and needy cases and can control payments accordingly," Lester said.

From another authoritative source, there is revealed a new angle or method of complying with the letter, if not the spirit, of the social-security laws, to secure pension payments. A prospective pensioner had $1,200 in cash but realized the law prohibited her from securing a pension if she had more than $200 in cash—so what did she do but invest $1,000 in a diamond ring, qualifying for the pension at the expense of the taxpayers.

A transient thinks of the State of Washington in terms of the land of milk and honey. One wonders if the most liberal social-security laws in the United States don't provide the milk flowing from the State treasury as the taxpayers or workers supply the honey in the form of cash to support them as drones—in a life of idleness and nonproductivity.

(This is the third in a series of articles on the relief situation in this county and the State of Washington.)

[From the Wenatchee (Wash.) Daily World]

WHY WORK?—HIGHER AND HIGHER THE RELIEF COSTS GO!—HERE ARE SOME CASE HISTORIES TO OPEN YOUR EYES AND MAKE YOU WONDER

There is an old saying that "the wheel that squeaks the loudest gets the most grease."

Apparently the Washington State Pension Union and the trained social workers who administer the State social-security program live by this saying—for they have made quite a gravy train out of the vote-getting social-security program that may carry them all to the brink, if not all the way to actual disaster.

You can readily understand why the trained social worker who never met a pay roll, owned property, or paid heavy taxes finds the present liberal social-security laws to their liking, their main dish you might say.

But where is it all leading?

Here is a good indication from typical relief cases within Chelan County—a county the State Department of Social Security refers to as "very conservative."

Names, places, dates, schools, and other pertinent personal data in these cases have been omitted but the complete cases are a matter of record.

The X family consists of the father, mother, a daughter, and three sons. They have been the recipients of public assistance continuously since 1935. Early in the case history, the father was sent to the State penitentiary for theft. Later the mother obtained a divorce.

X family history presents a pretty constant picture of petty misdemeanors on the part of the children. Trouble arose with the neighbors, school authorities, and finally the training school for two of the children. Only one child, a son, has not been involved in rather serious trouble with authorities.

There is evidence that the mother is not much concerned with the care of her children. She has allowed them to run about the neighborhood, destroying the property and annoying the neighborhood, while she was away frequenting beer parlors.

She has often been seen in an intoxicated condition. The older children were not taught to work during school vacation. Every trifling excuse was offered by the mother.

The aid-to-dependent-children check began at $50 a month in 1936 and was increased from time to time until at the present it is $104 a month. There were four children in the home at first; now there are but two.

The children were allowed by the mother to bring home articles from an unoccupied furnished house which they had broken into. In 1938 the oldest child, a girl, was sent to Grand Mound for running away from home and refusing to return.

In 1939 the second son was taken before the sheriff for breaking into a service station. Later he was taken to a farm in another county where he seemed to get along better, but the mother and daughter would not leave him alone.

They kept telling him he would be much better at home, so finally the foster parents gave him up. Later he had trouble with school authorities at school because of bad conduct and indolence. He was often truant and appeared before a juvenile court. The second son was sent to Chehalis for petty larceny.

In 1944 the mother came to the welfare department asking for a food voucher soon after earning $180 during 5 weeks of fruit picking—at a time when she was receiving full general assistance.

Authorities considered taking the children away from the mother but nothing was ever done about it. Three members of the family are now inmates of corrective institutions.

Who can estimate the future costs to the taxpayers of this State for this family?

Here is another interesting case of the Y family that has been saddled upon the taxpayers of the county.

This is a true story of Mr. and Mrs. Y, ages 39 and 37, respectively, and their family of 3 boys, ages 15, 14, and 12, and a daughter, age 1.

It all started 14 years ago in March, along with the birth of the New Deal. At first Mr. Y and family received periodical assistance, as an employable family, although the father complained about "not feeling good."

But Mrs. Y took the initiative in demanding assistance—known to many businessmen as a "moocher," some suspecting her as a kleptomaniac, taking small articles from stores.

In 5 years they moved about, living in Yakima, Okanogan, Douglas, and Pierce and King Counties.

During one period while receiving assistance in Chelan County, they moved seven times in 7 months. Moving so frequently, the children missed school, played truant, and attended schools not more than a month during the year.

It was a usual monthly complaint on Mrs. Y's part to the welfare department that they were hungry and without cash. In checking they found them with a fine car and everyone was smoking cigarettes. They constantly bedeviled the OPA board for more gas and used every subterfuge to secure an extra allowance.

Since July 1943 Mr. Y has considered himself unemployable—he complained of heart attacks. One doctor said it was angina pectoris—another said the same, but an expert said, "no organic trouble." The expert said he could do light work. However, the Y family moved to the country and refused to work.

They purchased a 10-acre tract of dry land—made a $200 down payment—although at this time they had sworn they had no assets so secured general assistance.

OPA learned of the purchase and informed the welfare department. Mrs. Y said the boy, 15, was earning the monthly payments and buying the house. Late in 1945 Mrs. Y was advised by the welfare department that when she brought in receipts to show that the payments were up to date and an estimate of the cost of drilling a well for general assistance grant would be increased to take care of these expenses.

And so it goes, so that now it pays Mr. Y to be unemployed and on relief—he couldn't make as much working—no hardship is worked save on the taxpayers who support the show.

Under present departmental regulations, relief applicants and recipients are asked to estimate the amount they feel they will need to cover their living expenses. Estimates are submitted item by item, and if they fall between a minimum and a maximum figure set by the department, the figure is accepted and assistance is granted in that amount.

However—and this is important to remember—the department has ruled that even though the relief client's estimate is below the minimum figure, he shall nevertheless be granted the higher minimum figure. This in effect means that many people on relief are receiving more than they themselves have requested. For example, suppose a relief recipient has a cow, some chickens, and a garden—not too unlikely for retired or pensioned people, and his food costs are reduced considerably—he still is paid the same "minimum" amount for that item in his relief grant—more than he himself requested.

How many such people are so involved in Chelan County?

The survey revealed among other things that the average was 14 percent overpayment in old-age pensions and 10 percent in the general-assistance and other programs.

Let's take the monthly public-assistance expenditures for Chelan County during January of 1945, 1946, and 1947, to show the rising costs and number of cases constituting the relief burden.

Consulting the official bluebook of the State of Washington Department of Social Security on Public Assistance, published each month and available to the county commissioners, we learn the following:

	January 1945	January 1946	January 1947
General assistance	$4,053.31	$4,606.99	$6,043.23
Old-age pensions	52,437.74	71,087.20	77,388.66
Aid to dependent children	5,449.88	6,406.18	10,359.77
Aid to blind	579.00	917.00	984.00
Administrative expenditures	2,750.60	3,217.27	4,810.59
Total	65,270.53	86,234.64	99,586.25
Extra expenses	299 cases	248 cases	363 cases
Doctor's expenses	$2,533.50	$2,230.90	$3,594.95
Dentist's expenses	1,045.00	208.00	272.00
Nurses' care	101.00	82.00	83.50
Drugs	614.94	806.21	1,096.20
Appliances	56.53	374.12	205.02
Ambulance		17.00	33.00
Hospitalization	681.65		1,436.00
Total	5,032.62	3,718.23	6,721.57
Grand total monthly expenses	70,303.15	89,952.87	106,307.82

Note the principal expenditures for old-age pensions: Observe that in January 1947, this year, Chelan County paid 7.70 percent more for old people than they did for dependent children—the youth of today who are the senior citizens of tomorrow. Most of them, however, are under voting age. Both the number of cases requiring medical attention and the amount expended reveals a large increase.

In less than 2 years the monthly expenditures have nearly doubled. Taking this month as an average, relief would cost this county alone $1,275,686.04 annually. And Chelan County, remember, is a very conservative county.

If this is the situation within Chelan County, what is the over-all picture throughout the State?

Again, let's consult the records. Here are the estimates of the State Department of Social Security on estimated expenditures for 1945–47 and their requested budget for 1947–49.

ESTIMATED EXPENDITURES, 1945–47

Program	Amount	Percent
Total	$129,024,080	100.0
Old-age assistance	82,701,748	64.1
Old-age medical	9,605,619	7.4
General assistance, medical [1]	7,100,000	5.5
General assistance [2]	11,218,540	8.7
Dependent children [3]	13,242,524	10.3
Aid to the blind	1,043,610	.8
Administration	4,112,039	3.2

REQUESTED BUDGET, 1947–49

Total	$175,084,552	100.0
Old-age assistance	104,396,760	59.6
Old-age medical	15,667,000	9.0
General assistance, medical [1]	8,764,800	5.0
General assistance [2]	19,044,000	10.9
Dependent children [3]	20,886,683	11.9
Aid to the blind	1,433,340	.8
Administration	4,891,969	2.8

[1] Includes medical care of dependent children.
[2] Includes $5,000,000 from county funds.
[3] Includes children under foster home care.

Again, it is obvious from study, old-age assistance takes the largest slice of the pie, over 600 percent more than aid to dependent children. General assistance, however, about which so much ado has been raised by the legislature, takes only one-eighth of old-age assistance, and shows only a 2.2 percent increase for the coming biennium.

(This is the fourth in a series of articles on the abuses in the administration of relief cases in this county and the State. The next article will make recommendations for amending the present laws and correcting the abuses through administrative measures.)

Mr. Speaker, as I speak today and as you read this, our Secretary of State is in conference in Moscow. He is defending the democratic way of life and the representative republican form of government against its aggressive enemies. The strength of the Nation he represents depends upon full employment. The world needs our full production. We cannot be guilty of condoning or encouraging the drone. Certainly if we are to present a proper manifestation of our form of government and way of life to the distraught peoples of the world, we must be eternally vigilant to protect our way of freedom from those who would abuse it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BENDER] is recognized for 10 minutes.

THE SITUATION IN GREECE

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday on the floor of the House, I asked the impertinent question about the President's proposed Greek deal—the very impertinent question, What does this policy cost; where will it end; what does it include? Today I wish to call attention to what I believe is an astonishing aspect of the Greek situation. At the present time the British are maintaining 100,000 men under arms in the little Nation of Palestine. At the same time, according to my information, the British have roughly 10,000 soldiers and 2,000 officers in Greece. Permit me to pose a question. Is Greece less important to the British than Palestine is? Or let me ask it another way. Is Greece more important to America than Palestine is? I ask this question because the British have informed us that they are no longer able economically, financially, or otherwise, to meet their commitments in Greece, yet they seem able to pour more and more men and money into Palestine.

On the face of it then, Mr. Speaker, it would seem to me that the British clearly do not believe that the battle against communism in Greece is as important to them as is the battle against the Jewish people in Palestine. This I would like to suggest, is a very interesting sidelight on our good President's request for $400,000,000. Why should the British prove to us by their actions that Greece is basically unimportant to the maintenance of the British Empire, and at the same time, our President comes before the Congress and insists that the situation in Greece, the present situation, must be maintained if America is to be secure. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, let us take a look at this business. The British Empire can do without Greece. They prefer to give up Greece, to stop fighting communism—so that they can have the men and sufficient resources to fight the Jews in Palestine. In other words, they do not think that Greece is important to them.

The British Empire can survive, apparently, without Greece, but our President tells us in his sincere way, that the United States cannot survive without Greece as it is. Mr. Speaker, why should the British tell us what is important? Why should the British make our decisions for us? Why should the British serve notice on us? Why should the British threaten us with the terror of what might happen politically in Greece? Why should the British, after they had completely messed up the economic and political situation in Greece for the past 2 years attempt to dump it in our laps as an unprofiitable adventure in creating monarchies.

Mr. Speaker, let us be blunt. Is there a single man now sitting in the House of Representatives who is willing to stand up and cast his vote for the present Greek monarchy? Does our State Department expect the American people to stomach the venality, the political corruption, of the present Greek monarchy? If it does, it may as well forget about the loan it has asked for. So then, Mr. Speaker, I submit these questions to the State Department, here on the floor of the House:

First. Why, if the British feel as does our President, that Greece is the key to the world battle against communism, why, Mr. Speaker, are the British withdrawing from Greece and continuing to pour money and troops into Palestine?

Second. Why do the British tell us what we should do in Greece and Turkey when they themselves refuse to act on their advice to us?

Third. Does President Truman and our State Department think that this Congress is going to vote $400,000,000 to sustain a corrupt Greek monarchy?

Mr. Speaker, the more I think about this request of the President for $400,000,000, the more I think that the President and our State Department need to answer a few plain, simple questions. The country is tired of global hypocrisy, of world-wide power politics—the country is tired of pouring its money down political rat holes from Singapore to Constantinople, on the assurance from the British that this will help defeat communism. Let us have the answers, Mr. Speaker, because the American people are beginning to think.

SENATE ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The Speaker announced his signature to an enrolled bill of the Senate of the following title:

S. 276. An act to provide for payment and settlement of mileage and other travel allowance accounts of military personnel.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 26 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, March 21, 1947, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE

FRIDAY, MARCH 21, 1947

(Legislative day of Wednesday, February 19, 1947)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Peter Marshall, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord our God, in the midst of the troubles that surround us, when compromises come home to roost and expediencies return to plague us, keep us from adding to the mistakes of the past. Save us from accepting a little of what we know to be wrong in order to get a little of what we imagine to be right. Help us to stand up for the inalienable rights of mankind and the principles of democratic government consistently and with ccurage, knowing that Thy power and Thy blessing will be upon us only when we are in the right. May we so speak, and vote, and live, as to merit Thy blessing. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. WHITE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, March 20, 1947, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Maurer, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 1366. An act to facilitate procurement of supplies and services by the War and Navy Departments, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 2413. An act to amend the Federal Reserve Act, and for other purposes.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY UNION — ANNOUNCEMENT OF MEETING OF AMERICAN GROUP

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senate's indulgence for just a moment to make an announcement. Many Senators are familiar with the fact that the Interparliamentary Union, which is an international organization of members of the various parliaments of the world, has been in existence and has had an honorable record for more than 50 years. They have customarily held an annual conference at some place selected, usually at one of the capitals of the world. There has been no such general conference since 1939, prior to the outbreak of World War II.

As president of the American group of this international conference, I am calling a meeting tomorrow at 10 o'clock in my room here, off the Senate Chamber, at which I should be happy if all Senators interested in the matter could attend. A similar announcement has been made in the House of Representatives by Chairman EATON, of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, and, inasmuch as the organization has been dormant necessarily on account of the war, it is desirable that all Senators and Representatives who are interested in the organization may attend, if possible, and therefore I am taking advantage of this opportunity to make the announcement while there is a full attendance of the Senate.

MEETING OF COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I request the permission of the Senate for the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare to sit at 2 o'clock for a brief meeting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, consent of the Senate is granted.

WORLD HEALTH ORGANIZATION — MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT (H. DOC. NO. 177)

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

(For President's message, see today's proceedings of the House of Representatives on p. 2389.)

TRANSACTION OF ADDITIONAL ROUTINE BUSINESS

By unanimous consent, the following additional routine business was transacted:

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following letters, which were referred as indicated:

INTERIM REPORT ON EXPORTATION AND IMPORTATION OF ARMS, AMMUNITION, AND IMPLEMENTS OF WAR

A letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting, pursuant to law, an interim report on the exportation and importation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war under licenses issued by the Secretary of State for the years 1941 to 1945, inclusive (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

TRANSMISSION AND SALE OF ELECTRIC ENERGY GENERATED AT FORT PECK PROJECT, MONTANA

A letter from the Under Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, pursuant to law, financial statements and reports covering the transmission and sale of electric energy generated at the Fort Peck project, Montana, for the first, second, and third fiscal years of operation (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Public Works.

AUDIT REPORT OF UNITED STATES HOUSING CORPORATION

A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on the audit of the United States Housing Corporation for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1945 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

OCTOBER 1946 REPORT OF RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

A letter from the Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of that Corporation for the month of October 1946 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

REPORT OF LIBRARY OF CONGRESS PLANNING COMMITTEE

A letter from the Librarian of Congress, transmitting a report of the Library of Congress Planning Committee relating to the problem of the future of the Library of Congress (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, or presented, and referred as indicated:

By the PRESIDENT pro tempore:

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Indiana; to the Committee on Finance:

"Enrolled Senate Concurrent Resolution 7

"Concurrent resolution memorializing Congress concerning unemployment compensation and employment service

"Whereas the Congress of the United States did by the Social Security Act and the Wagner-Peyser Act attempt to establish a program of cooperation between the several States and the United States in the field of employment compensation and free employment service; and

"Whereas the departments entrusted with the administration of such programs on behalf of the Federal Government have consistently perverted the congressional will by converting such programs into programs of dictation and minute supervision of the States, by such Federal agencies, all founded upon their control of the funds provided by Congress for such purposes; and

"Whereas the existing program is unjustifiably expensive to both the United States and the States in that dual staffs are required for the purpose of collecting the pay-roll taxes by which these programs are financed and in that a large amount of the time and effort of the agencies of both the State and the United States is devoted to intergovernmental dealings; and

"Whereas it is essential that at this time governmental costs be reduced and governmental efficiency be increased: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana (the House of Representatives concurring), That—

"1. It is hereby recommended to the Congress of the United States that legislation be enacted fixing certain definite minimum standards for State legislation and administration of unemployment compensation and employment service programs and that upon compliance by the State with such standards the taxpayers within such State who are liable for Federal unemployment tax be given full exemption therefrom.

"2. That it is hereby further recommended that any decision by any agency of the Federal Government in which it is determined that the State has not met such standards be fully reviewable in an appropriate court upon request of the State and that pending the determination of such appeal the State legislation be considered as having met such standards.

"3. That it is further recommended that the power of Federal administrative agencies to supplement congressional standards by rule or regulation be specifically denied.

"4. That a certified copy of this resolution be sent by the secretary of the senate to the Clerk of the House of Representatives and to the Secretary of the Senate of the Eightieth Congress and to each United States Senator and Representative from Indiana."

A cablegram from Nicolas Noguera Rivera, secretary-treasurer, San Juan, P. R., embodying a resolution adopted at the sixteenth convention of the Puerto Rico Free Federation of Workingmen State Branch, AFL, Arecibo, P. R., favoring clarification of the political status of Puerto Rico; to the Committee on Public Lands.

A cablegram from P. Rivera Martinez, president, and Nicolas Noguera Rivera, secretary, San Juan, P. R., embodying a resolution adopted at the sixteenth convention of the Puerto Rico Free Federation of Workingmen State Branch, AFL, Arecibo, P. R., favoring a thorough investigation of the privileged contract negotiated by the Commodity Credit Corporation with Cuban sugar producers; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

A cablegram from P. Rivera Martinez, president, and Nicolas Noguera Rivera, secretary, San Juan, P. R., embodying a resolution adopted at the sixteenth convention of the Puerto Rico Free Federation of Workingmen State Branch, ALF, Arecibo, P. R., favoring an amendment to the Organic Act of Puerto Rico so as to permit the election of a governor at or before the next general elections in 1948; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. DWORSHAK:

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Idaho; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

"Senate Joint Memorial 5

"A joint memorial to the President and the Congress of the United States to strengthen present sanitary requirements governing the importation of livestock and livestock products and to appropriate additional funds to the Bureau of Animal Industry, United States Department of Agriculture, in order that border inspection may be strengthened and a system of patrol established along the northern boundary of Mexico to guard against the importation of people, animals, and materials carrying the infection of foot-and-mouth disease, and also petitioning Congress to offer to the Government of the Republic of Mexico such facilities as may be available from the Bureau of Animal Industry, United States Department of Agriculture, and appropriating money to provide for such facilities and to extend aid to the Government of the Republic of Mexico in order that foot-and-mouth disease may be eradicated.

"We, your memorialists, the Senate and House of Representatives of the Twenty-ninth Legislature of the State of Idaho, do hereby respectfully represent that—

"Whereas foot-and-mouth disease now exists in livestock in the Republic of Mexico; and

"Whereas the disease has spread from the six original States involved in the vicinity of Mexico City as far west and north as the State of Zacatecas; and

"Whereas it is extremely doubtful if the Government of the Republic of Mexico can eradicate this disease from their livestock without additional assistance; and

"Whereas the presence of foot-and-mouth disease in the Republic of Mexico presents a very definite threat to the prosperity of the livestock industry and the entire economic welfare of the United States: Be it therefore

"Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Idaho, That we earnestly petition the Congress of the United States to strengthen the present sanitary requirements governing the importation of livestock and livestock products from Mexico and from other countries in which foot-and-mouth disease exists; be it further

"Resolved, That we earnestly petition Congress to appropriate additional funds to the Bureau of Animal Industry, United States Department of Agriculture, in order that border inspection may be strengthened and a system of patrol be established along the northern boundary of Mexico to guard against the importation of people, animals, and materials carrying the infection of foot-and-mouth disease; be it further

"Resolved, That we petition and urge the Congress of the United States to offer to the Government of the Republic of Mexico such facilities and assistance as may be available from the Bureau of Animal Industry, United States Department of Agriculture, and to appropriate funds to provide for this assistance and to provide direct financial aid to the Government of the Republic of Mexico in order that foot-and-mouth disease be eradicated from their livestock; be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this joint memorial be forwarded by the secretary of state to the President of the United States and to the President pro tempore of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Honorable Secretary of State, the Honorable Secretary of the United States Department of Agriculture, and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Idaho with the request that they bring this matter forcibly to the attention of the Members of the Congress of the United States.

"This senate joint memorial passed the senate on the 27th day of February 1947.

"This senate joint memorial passed the house of representatives on the 5th day of March 1947."

(The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Idaho, identical with the foregoing, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.)

By Mr. GREEN (for himself and Mr. MCGRATH):

A resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations; to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

"Resolution commending the President of the United States of America for his forthright action in favor of aid to Greece and Turkey in order to permit the countries to be strong in their efforts to stem the tide of communism

"Whereas upon March 12, 1947, the President of the United States of America called on the Nation to devote money, materials, and military skill to halt the world march of communism, specifically requesting $400,000,000 to aid Greece and Turkey, the existence of which is threatened by terrorist activities of a militant minority spearheaded by Communists; and

"Whereas the President's address, an event of the first magnitude, calls unmistakably for action which will launch the United States on a new and positive foreign policy of worldwide responsibility for the maintenance of peace and order; and

"Whereas this is a matter of such significance that it transcends all political party lines, as evidenced by the immediate support of the President's action by the influential Senator ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG, Presiding Officer of the Senate and chairman of its Foreign Relations Committee, who made the statement:

" 'We cannot fail to back up the President at such an hour, even though many critical details remain to be settled in consultation with Congress': Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations now commends the President of the United States of America for his forthright action in favor of aid to Greece and Turkey, in order to permit the countries to be strong in their efforts to stem the tide of communism, since, as he said, 'Totalitarian regimes imposed on free peoples undermine the foundations of international peace and hence the security of the United States'; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives from Rhode Island in the Congress of the United States be and they are earnestly requested to support the President in his unfaltering enunciation of a new foreign policy; and the Secretary of State of Rhode Island is hereby authorized and directed to transmit to them and to the President of the United States of America duly certified copies of this resolution."

GUEST HOUSE AT VETERANS' HOSPITAL AT OTEEN, N. C.

Mr. HOEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to present a petition forwarded me by Richard M. Sherod, chairman, Oteen Veterans Committee for the Construction of a Guest House at the Veterans' Hospital, Oteen, N. C.

This petition is signed by a large number of veterans from the States of Alabama, Delaware, District of Columbia, Florida, Georgia, Maryland, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia, and West Virginia, who are tubercular patients now receiving treatment at Oteen Hospital. Patients from 37 States and from Scotland and Canada are receiving treatment in this hospital at this time. A guest house is very greatly needed to accommodate members of the families who come to visit patients who are very ill. There are no present facilities in the community to accommodate relatives or visitors who go to Oteen to visit patients in the hospital.

I request that this petition be referred to the appropriate committee for consideration.

There being no objection, the petition was received and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

The following reports of a committee were submitted:

By Mr. TOBEY, from the Committee on Banking and Currency:

H. R. 2535. A bill to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act; without amendment; and

H. J. Res. 118. Joint resolution to strengthen the common defense by maintaining an adequate domestic rubber-producing industry; with amendments (Rept. No. 63).

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BUTLER:

S. 959. A bill providing for contributions to States and local governmental units in lieu of taxes on real property held by the Federal Government; creating a commission to determine and pay such contributions; and for other purposes;

S. 967. A bill to amend the act entitled "An act to prohibit the killing of wild birds and wild animals in the District of Columbia," approved June 30, 1906, so as to permit the killing of starlings; and

S. 968. A bill to authorize the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia to limit the number of taxicabs licensed and operated in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. TAYLOR:

S. 969. A bill for the relief of Damian Arruti; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. GREEN:

S. 970. A bill for the relief of Mr. and Mrs. Harold T. Prosser; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(Mr. AIKEN introduced Senate bill 971, to amend title V of the act entitled "An act to expedite the provision of housing in connection with the national defense, and for other purposes," approved October 14, 1940, as amended, to authorize the Federal Works Administrator to make grants to institutions of higher learning for the construction of educational facilities required in the education and training of war veterans, which was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and appears under a separate heading.)

(Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma introduced Senate bill 972, to declare the policy of the United States with respect to hydroelectric power generated in connection with federally financed water development projects and to provide procedures for carrying out such policy, which was referred to the Committee on Public Works, and appears under a separate heading.)

(Mr. BALDWIN introduced Senate bill 973, to amend the Surplus Property Act of 1944, as amended, so as to provide for preference of disposal of civilian defense property to the States and local governmental units wherein such property was used, which was referred to the Committee on Armed Services, and appears under a separate heading.)

DISPOSAL OF CIVILIAN DEFENSE PROPERTY

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill and have it appropriately referred; and in connection with the bill I should like to make a statement for the benefit of the RECORD.

The bill is a bill to amend the Surplus Property Act of 1944, as amended, so as to provide for preference of disposal of civilian defense property to the States and local governmental units wherein such property was used. It may very well be that it is too late to do anything about it. On the other hand, it is better late than never.

During the war years a great many civilians spent long hours and hard work in the civilian defense program, and I think they did it patriotically, loyally, and with great enthusiasm. In many cases and in many communities the work was done with marked ability.

During those years the Federal Government made available to the local Civilian Defense units certain items of fire-fighting equipment. They were small items, such as helmets and equipment of that nature. Such items were made available in great number.

At the close of the Civilian Defense program the communities were asked to collect such equipment and turn it back to the Federal Government. In my home town of Stratford we had an exceptionally active and exceptionally good civilian defense program. A large number of the people were active in the program during the war years and devoted hard work and great thought to it. Many of those people had some of the equipment referred to. They would have liked very much to keep the helmets and some of the other items as mementoes of their participation in the war as civilians. However, under the direction of the Government, the town authorities in Stratford collected the equipment and turned it over to the Federal Government.

I am advised by the general manager of our town of Stratford that all the equipment which was collected by the town and turned over to the Federal Government—and there was quite a substantial quantity of it—was sold to a private dealer by the Federal Government, through the War Assets Administration, I believe, for less than $50. The town would have been glad to buy it and leave it in the hands of the people, who would have liked very much to keep it. Nevertheless, that is what was done with it.

It seems to me that if all the material has not been collected, and there are people in some towns who would like to keep the equipment, such towns should have the first call on it and should have an opportunity to bid it in and buy it, at least for the price that the Federal Government may be able to get for it from a private dealer. This is the purpose of the bill which I am introducing.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 973) to amend the Surplus Property Act of 1944, as amended, so as to provide for preference of disposal of civilian defense property to the States and local governmental units wherein such property was used, introduced by Mr. BALDWIN, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Armed Services.

UNITED STATES OF EUROPE

Mr. FULBRIGHT (for himself and Mr. THOMAS of Utah) submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con Res. 10), which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress favors the creation of a United States of Europe, within the framework of the United Nations.

INTERNATIONAL REFUGEE ORGANIZATION—AMENDMENT

Mr. REVERCOMB (for himself, Mr. McCARRAN, and Mr. McGRATH) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 77) providing for membership and participation by the United States in the International Refugee Organization and authorizing an appropriation therefor, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE

On motion of Mr. MILLIKIN, and by unanimous consent, the Committee on Finance was discharged from the further consideration of the following bills, and they were referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare:

S. 670. A bill to amend the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, as amended, and for other purposes; and

S. 956. A bill to amend the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944, as amended, so as to extend the benefits of titles II, III, IV, and V of such act to members of the American Field Service.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED

The following bills were each read twice by their titles and referred, as indicated:

H. R. 1366. An act to facilitate procurement of supplies and services by the War and Navy Departments, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Armed Services.

H. R. 2413. An act to amend the Federal Reserve Act, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

THE BOXCAR SHORTAGE

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, there has been great national concern and a great amount of publicity with respect to the present shortage of wheat and the resultant increase in the prices of wheat and also of bread. The farmers of the Middle West, and particularly of my State, have done their utmost in the production in wheat. Now they are faced, as they have been faced during the past many months, and even years, with a shortage of boxcars with which to send to the market the wheat they produce. Most midwestern elevators have been blocked for months and months, at a time when wheat is so sorely needed in other sections of the United States, and, for that matter, in the entire world.

Four midwestern railroads, including the Great Northern Railway, have done their utmost to alleviate this situation. At this critical time the Great Northern Railway has only 57 percent of its ownership of cars on its own railroad. Other western railroads are in exactly the same position. It has been a matter of so much concern to those railroads that they have found it necessary from time to time to insert advertisements in the various newspapers. I know of no action that would contribute more to the stabilization of grain prices at the present time than that which would return to western railroads the boxcars which they own and which they are entitled to use on their own roads.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks an advertisement by the Great Northern Railway entitled "Wanted, 20,466 Boxcars."

There being no objection, the advertisement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WANTED: 20,466 BOXCARS

When a serious boxcar shortage last fall blocked the full movement of new grain and other commodities to markets Great Northern then gave shippers in its territory indisputable facts behind that deplorable situation.

Today, 7 months later, Great Northern is obligated to advise shippers that there has been no improvement in the boxcar supply on its lines. Factually, the car situation now is worse than in August, and the railway proposes to again tell why.

Great Northern is not receiving its deserved, proportionate share of boxcars because other lines, principally those in the East, are using them.

This railway owns 23,789 boxcars, a very large number of them top-grade, built especially for hauling grain, forest products, and other commodities requiring protection from weather.

On March 10, 1947, Great Northern had on its line only 13,737 boxcars, which represented 57.7 percent of the railway's total ownership. The important fact in those figures is that only 3,323 of the 13,737 cars were Great Northern-owned. The other 10,414 boxcars on the railway on that date belonged to other railways, and far too many of them were unfit for transporting grain, flour, and dressed lumber.

Where are 20,466 Great Northern boxcars, which are so desperately needed by shippers along the railway?

Boxcars do a lot of traveling. They roll from coast to coast and over both borders. Yet Great Northern has strong convictions, based on observations and Association of American Railroads' statistics, that most of our truant cars are working for lines east of the Mississippi River.

The association reported on February 1 (the most recent figures available) that boxcar possession on all railroads in the Eastern and Allegheny territories then was 110.1 and 103.1 percent, respectively, of ownership.

The same association, of which Great Northern is a member, consistently has promised relief for shippers on the railway, and with equal consistence has failed to effect any appreciable improvement in getting our own cars back home.

Lack of materials for new car construction has, of course, contributed to the boxcar headache. Great Northern has been unable to obtain materials for building 500 new boxcars, authorized almost a year ago.

The railway industry has been told that an increasing amount of steel and lumber will be available for new-car construction. It will be a year or more before enough boxcars can be built to bring the supply back to normal.

Meanwhile, Great Northern intends to continue its daily fight for an equitable supply of boxcars, its own, preferably, for shippers on the railway.

GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY.

EXEMPTION OF EMPLOYERS FROM LIABILITY FOR PORTAL-TO-PORTAL WAGES IN CERTAIN CASES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2157) to define and limit the jurisdiction of the courts to regulate actions arising under certain laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] for himself and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. MCGRATH], proposed as a substitute for parts II, III, and IV of the committee amendment as amended, being lines 19, on page 10, down to and including line 2, on page 23, as amended.

The Senate is proceeding today under a unanimous-consent agreement reading as follows:

That on the calendar day of Friday, March 21, 1947, at not later than the hour of 3 o'clock p. m., the Senate proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment or motion that may be pending or that may be proposed to the committee substitute, and upon the committee substitute for the pending bill, H. R. 2157, the so-called portal-to-portal pay bill, and that on said day at not later than 5 o'clock p. m. the Senate proceed to vote upon the final passage of the bill itself.

Mr. WHITE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] are necessarily absent.

Mr. WHERRY. I announce that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON] is absent because of illness.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CORDON] are absent by leave of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Ninety Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I hesitate to occupy the time of the Senate for even a brief period on the pending measure on which we are to vote today. I do not speak with any delusions that I may be able to affect the vote of any Senator, either on the substitute or the bill itself. But I do wish to express some views with reference to the proposed legislation on my own behalf, and on behalf of the record which I shall make in the votes I shall cast.

I recognized the sincerity, the ability, and the good faith of the members of the Committee on the Judiciary which has reported the bill to the Senate, and especially of the subcommittee, of which my able and distinguished colleague the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] was a member. In what I shall have to say I shall not in the remotest degree cast any reflection on their ability, their sincerity, or their good faith. But there are certain features of the proposal to which I cannot give my approval, and I feel it my duty to record at least a few of the reasons in as brief a manner as possible, realizing that we are to vote at a certain hour on the substitute.

The proposed legislation is called portal-to-portal legislation. The history of the pending bill certainly makes it a portal-to-portal bill. It came through the portal of the House of Representatives after having gone through the portal of the committee of the House. It came through the portal of the Senate and thence through the portal of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate, in the meantime another bill having been introduced in the Senate by the chairman of the committee, which went through the portal of the Senate to the portal of the committee, and came out through the portal of the committee into the portal of the Senate. In the meantime, both bills went back through the portal of the Senate, through the portal of the committee, and out through the portal of the committee again and in through the portal of the Senate. So it is in truth and in deed a portal-to-portal bill.

During the process of migration on the part of this proposed legislation it changed both its raiment and its character so that in its present form it is almost unrecognizable as having any relationship to the first bill introduced in the Senate on the subject of portal-to-portal claims.

I have not had an opportunity to read carefully the extensive hearings which were held on the bill. Such time as I have had available I have utilized in running through the hearings. I have read the original portal-to-portal bill introduced by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], the House bill as it passed the House, the amendment reported by the committee by way of a substitute, the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from Rhode Island, and the reports on the two bills. I am compelled to say that I am still lingering in a certain amount of fog and confusion as to what is intended by the proposed legislation and what will be its ultimate effect upon the rights of workers as well as employers throughout the United States.

At the outset I wish to say that I deplore the tendency of recent years either by legislation to anticipate decisions of the courts and thereby in advance nullify them or make them impossible or irrelevant or by the passage of legislation to nullify decisions after they have been rendered. That tendency has taken root in the Congress of the United States to a larger degree within recent years than in any previous time, so far as I can recall, in the history of the United States. We saw evidence of it 2 or 3 years ago in legislation designed to lift out of the purview and the scope of the antitrust laws insurance companies engaged in interstate commerce, as they were, and as they were declared later by the Supreme Court to be so engaged. Fortunately, through the members of the committee, among whom especially was the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], legislation was worked out which seemed to be satisfactory to the country and to all parties concerned. But the original proposal was a deliberate effort, Mr. President, to forestall an opinion of the Supreme Court, which was later rendered, holding insurance companies subject to the regulation of Congress because they were engaged in interstate commerce, which I had all my life believed ought to be the law if it was not.

We see now an effort being made, similar to the effort which was made in the last Congress, to forestall an opinion of the Supreme Court with respect to certain rate practices indulged in by the railroads of this country and approved, at least for the time, by the Interstate Commerce Commission which victimize the people of a very large section of the United States, of which my State is a part. That legislation is now pending in the Senate of the United States. It represents an effort to deny to the Supreme Court the right to adjudicate litigation on the part of the State governments of the States involved in order to terminate widespread discrimination in the treatment of communities and shippers and manufacturers and consumers of the United States of America. I do not support that proposed legislation, and I shall not support it.

Here in the Senate we have complained frequently that the executive branch of the Government was impinging upon the rights of the legislative branch. In the Senate of the United States we have frequently bitterly complained that even the Supreme Court was impinging upon the rights of the Congress by placing interpretations upon acts of Congress not intended by Congress. Although it is a peculiar function of the courts to interpret the acts of Congress and their application to the people, yet when the Senate as a whole, or Members of the Senate and the House, have felt that the Supreme Court had gone too far in interpreting laws which Congress had enacted, we have bitterly complained of judicial usurpation; and we have also bitterly complained of executive usurpation in the exercise of the functions intended by the Constitution to be exercised by the three coordinate branches of our Government.

In spite of this criticism and this complaint on the part of Members of Congress, we find ourselves now in the midst of legislation that may deny permanently certain rights to American citizens who are required both in peace and in war to perform all the duties upon which their country may call upon them to perform. We are now considering legislation growing out of a decision of the Supreme Court which is not yet final, which will have to be reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States when the case involving the question out of which this legislation grows again reaches that Court.

So, Mr. President, it seems to me that we may be estopped hereafter in our criticism either of the executive or the judicial branch of our Government if we ourselves undertake to deny to the courts or to any executive agency set up by Congress the right to interpret the laws which Congress enacts.

I therefore deplore this tendency of legislative interference with the functions and the jurisdictions of the courts to pass upon questions which they themselves do not voluntarily seek, but which are brought before them by citizens of this great country, and upon which they must pass judgment in good conscience, which we feel they must possess, notwithstanding frequently we may disagree with their logic and their conclusions. So much for that, Mr. President.

I am going to vote for the substitute amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from Rhode Island. There are some things in it to which I do not give wholehearted support, which violate my own conception of proper legislation upon a subject that has been whipped up because of a temporary situation, as I believe; but I think the substitute proposal is so infinitely better than the original bill or the committee amendment that I shall vote for it, and do so gladly, as between the two provisions which are now before the Senate.

Mr. President, I have been disturbed from the beginning of the agitation for portal-to-portal legislation over whether in our zeal, in what during this debate has been called our "hysteria"—I do not use that term, but I quote it from some of those who have discussed this proposed legislation—we may deprive American citizens of rights to which they are entitled and which are guaranteed to them by the Constitution of the United States.

There is more involved in this legislation, and there is more involved in the legislative process by which it has been brought to the Senate, than the mere Mount Clemens Pottery case involving walking time, or washing time, or changing-clothes time before or after the day's work has begun or ended. There is more involved in this legislation and its effect and its permanent results than the mere question of whether a man shall be paid while he is walking from the gate of a plant into the machine shop where he works, or back to the gate when he goes out at eventide, or whether he shall be paid for the time consumed while washing before or after he works, and changing his clothes. There is something more involved than the question whether a man shall be paid while he is riding to or from his work. That was the case upon which this legislation largely hinged and which brought it here. The Mount Clemens Pottery case did not involve many situations which I can visualize in my own mind with respect to workers. The Mount Clemens Pottery case did not involve a case such as that about which I inquired the other day, in which a man, under the fair-labor-standards law, is required to work 8 hours a day or 40 hours a week. Whether he is organized or unorganized makes little difference. It may be that the organized laborer, by reason of his organization, is in a better position than is the unorganized laborer to protect his own rights and demand a contract that is satisfactory to him. I think we all recognize that if that were not true there would be no labor organizations and no particular reason for them. We have always recognized the fact that organization among laboring men was essential in order that they might protect their own rights by concerted action; and we have legalized such organizations by declaring that they shall not be regarded as belonging to the category of violators of the antitrust laws, just as we have legalized farmers' organizations for the same reason. So we may assume that members of labor organizations are in a better position to protect themselves, their wages, and their conditions of labor than are the unorganized millions of workers who outnumber those who are members of labor organizations.

The Mount Clemens Pottery case did not involve a situation in which a man is required to work 8 hours in what is fantastically called his principal employment, which is not defined, as many other things in the bill which must be interpreted by the courts are not defined. The other day on the floor of the Senate, while the Senator from Nevada was speaking on the substitute, I asked whether a certain situation which I described would be covered, and if so, to what extent and in what manner. Suppose that a man is a machinist or a mechanic of some kind. He is required to go to work at 8 o'clock. Let us assume for a moment that he is not a member of an organization. He is required to enter upon the actual labor, which might be termed his principal employment, at 8 o'clock in the morning and to spend 8 hours at such principal employment. But let us suppose that his employer requires him to be on the grounds and within the shop at 7:30 in the morning in order that he may spend half an hour sharpening and preparing the tools with which he himself or his colleagues in the factory are to work. Can anybody say that under those circumstances the 40-hour workweek has been complied with, as intended by the Fair Labor Standards Act? If he is required to do that every day, instead of working 8 hours a day he will be working 8½ hours a day. If he works 6 days a week, instead of 40 hours a week, he will be working more than 50 hours, every moment of which he is under the control of his employer, working with tools which belong to his employer, and he must abide by his orders or run the risk of discharge from his employment.

Is that a part of his principal employment, or is that preliminary; or, if he is required to do it after the close of the shop in the afternoon, is that a part of the "postliminary" work for which there is to be no compensation unless there is a contract or unless it has been the practice and custom for the employer to pay for the extra work done at his command?

Mr. President, regardless of what may be the effect of the pending legislation so far as the future is concerned, or on any rights that may have accrued up to this time in this controversy, I am unwilling, by legislation, to say to a court called upon to administer and enforce the rights of individuals, however humble they may be, however unknown they may be, however they may live their lives in the shadows rather than on the peaks of human existence and human enterprise, that for all time in the future, whether a man is a member of any organization or not, he shall be denied the right to recover, or at least have a court pass upon his right to recover, wages for the extra work which he is compelled by his employer to do and with respect to which he has no remedy and no alternative except the loss of the employment upon which he and his family so vitally depend.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. COOPER. I think the distinguished Senator knows that I am always impressed by his remarks. However, I gathered from the illustration which he propounded that there was a question in his mind as to what would be the status of an employee who was required to report for his work some time before the beginning of his regularly scheduled hours to perform certain activities, and whether or not he would receive pay for such activities. Is that correct?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is correct, subject to the further observation that, of course, if he has a contract, either written or unwritten, or if there has been a practice or custom—whether it is immemorial or short-lived—he would be entitled to pay. But without a contract, either written or unwritten, and without a custom having prevailed or a practice having been indulged in in that plant, in the future he would not, as I understand, be entitled to recover, because that work would be regarded as portal-to-portal activity, compensation for which is sought to be barred by the bill.

Mr. COOPER. The distinguished Senator has perhaps not had the opportunity to read the report of the committee. Let me say that on page 48 of the report of the committee that exact situation, or one as nearly comparable to it as probably could be cited, is discussed. In the report it is clearly stated that under such circumstances it is the intention of the framers of the bill that such activities shall be compensable, as a part of the principal activity.

Mr. BARKLEY. I thank my colleague. However, I get the very strong impression, if I am mistaken I wish to be corrected, from reading the bill and the report, and listening to the discussion, that under the definition of portal-to-portal activities, unless there is a contract, written or unwritten, or a custom under which such activities are compensable, all preliminary and postliminary work required by an employer is noncompensable.

If I am mistaken about that I should like to be corrected, because I do not want to make a misstatement about it. That is my understanding of the bill. In another place in the bill it is provided that hereafter courts shall not have jurisdiction to try or consider portal-to-portal activities beyond those encompassed in a contract or by custom or practice.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Has the Senator from Kentucky analyzed the definition of portal-to-portal pay in this bill?

Mr. BARKLEY. I cannot say that I have analyzed it, because I think it is beyond analysis.

Mr. LUCAS. That is exactly the point. If there is a definition of portal-to-portal pay in the bill which will not give the courts plenty of trouble to ascertain what those who are the proponents of this bill are driving at, then I cannot understand the English language.

Mr. BARKLEY. The bill undertakes to define portal-to-portal activities by referring to section 2 of the bill.

Mr. LUCAS. It is not done in an affirmative way; it is done in a negative way.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is necessary to go from the section which undertakes to define portal-to-portal back to section 2 to find out what the authors are talking about; and when we get back to section 2 we find that portal-to-portal means anything which is not covered by contract or by custom or practice. Anything beyond that is portal-to-portal, according to the definition, if the definition is of any value whatever. In my judgment, the courts will have as much difficulty undertaking to determine what portal-to-portal means in this legislation as they have had in undertaking to write the decision out of which this legislation grows.

Mr. LUCAS. I have been here quite a long time, and I have never seen a definition like it in any legislation which has been considered since I have been a Member of the Senate. I have never before seen any committee attempt to define a term other than in an affirmative way which tells the Senate exactly what is meant. In this bill we have to go around Robin Hood's barn to attempt to find out what it means, and when we do so we find nothing, in my opinion, to define the term.

Mr. BARKLEY. Whether it was so intended or not, the bill is a declaration of no confidence in the courts of the United States. It is brought here because Congress fears that some court—either the United States Supreme Court or some Federal court or some other court whose decisions might reach the Supreme Court—might hold in a manner and to a degree that Congress did not wish them to decide. Therefore there is no way to avoid the conclusion which I entertain that the reason for this legislation is the fear of Congress that the courts in their decisions and interpretations might not go along the lines desired by the Congress of the United States. Yet, notwithstanding that implied lack of faith in our courts, the committee bill leaves to those same courts the duty of finding a way through the labyrinthine maze to interpret what is meant by portal-to-portal legislation or portal-to-portal activities or portal-to-portal compensation.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Inasmuch as the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Illinois were discussing the definition, or the lack of definition, of portal-to portal activities in this bill, it seems to me that the occasion should not pass without specifically reciting the language of the proposed statute.

Mr. BARKLEY. I should be very glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The language leaves it absolutely clear in the mind of any reasonable person that there is positively no definition in the bill concerning portal-to-portal activities which may be set up as to existing claims.

On page 11, beginning in line 19, the bill provides, as part of section 2:

For the purposes of this section—

That means the whole section—

no judicial or administrative interpretation—

Of the three acts—

shall have the effect of changing any written or nonwritten contract between the employer and employee so as to make compensable any portal-to-portal activities (as defined in sec. 5).

Yesterday when I undertook to read the bill during the debate, when I reached that point I turned to section 5 to find what the definition of portal-to-portal activities is in the minds of those who drafted the legislation. Section 5 appears on page 14 of the bill, beginning in line 3. It is entitled "Definition." Certainly when we come to a section entitled "Definition" we are entitled to believe that the authors of the bill will give us a definition. But what do they say?

As used in this part—

That means all of section 2, section 3, section 4, and, of course, section 5—

As used in this part, the term "portal-to-portal activities" means those activities which section 2 hereof provides shall not be a basis of liability or punishment under—

The three acts.

So we have the amusing and absurd situation that section 2 says that the proposed law deals with portal-to-portal activities as defined in section 5, and section 5 defines them as they are defined in section 2. It is a perfect run around. No court, no Congress, no committee, no Senator can interpret portal-to-portal activities so far as part II of the bill is concerned.

Mr. BARKLEY. And the result is that sections 2 and 5 meet themselves coming and going in every portal which they enter.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. TOBEY. The Senator a few moments ago in his remarks stated that in his opinion this bill evidenced a lack of confidence in the courts of the land. Taking that theme for the purpose of a brief interpolation, I point out that I regret that attitude and I deplore it and I attack it and I shall do so in the future. Let me point out to the Senator that the same disease, the same lack of confidence, was exemplified in the oil legislation a year ago which the Senator and I tried to defeat on the floor, and it is also manifested in the so-called Bulwinkle bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. Before the Senator came in I had referred to the Bulwinkle legislation and had referred to the previous effort to deprive the Supreme Court of the power to pass upon whether insurance was interstate commerce. I did not advert to the oil situation, and I thank the Senator for adding that to the list. I concur completely in the statement of the Senator, and I remarked on the fact that I deplored the recent tendency of Congress to undertake to impinge upon the jurisdiction of the courts, as every Congress has from time to time criticized the Executive for undertaking to impinge upon its rights.

Mr. TOBEY. It is a very dangerous situation.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is correct.

I do not want to take any further time with respect to the lack of any definition of portal-to-portal activities. Section 2 refers to the definition in section 5. We turn to section 5 and do not find any definition there. It might have been easy or it might have been difficult to say "portal-to-portal activities" mean this, that, or the other; but it does not say that. If we are to take it for anything of value, whatever it means, taking the two sections together, everything that is not specified in section 2 is portal-to-portal, and that means that many activities in which men engage in good faith, where they may be required from time to time to work for an employer who may be arbitrary or unreasonable, will be regarded, if it were of any value at all as a definition, as a portal-to-portal activity.

This bill provides that even custom or practice, when it is inconsistent with a contract, shall not govern. I am very much disturbed about that provision, because there is no definition of a contract in this bill. All through the measure reference is made to written and unwritten contracts. I imagine that very few individual employees have a written contract with their employer. No doubt they applied for a position or a job or for work, and the employer told them what the wage would be, and the employees went to work at that wage. In the case of such a worker there is an implied contract, of course; and where there is neither a written nor an unwritten contract that is enforceable, the law from time immemorial has stepped in and presumed the existence of a contract between the employer and the employee. In this bill reference is made to written and unwritten contracts; but the bill provides that wherever custom or practice established between the employer and the employee is inconsistent with a written or unwritten contract, then the practice or custom is null and void and of no effect.

Mr. President, what constitutes inconsistency with a contract? Let us suppose there is a written contract between any given employer and any given employee to employ the worker at, let us say, $5 a day for 40 hours a week. Let us suppose that nothing is said in the contract about overtime or preliminary work or postliminary work or whether the employer shall have the right to compel the employee to be on the job half an hour before the time when the machine shop commences operations, in order that he may engage in some preliminary work preparatory to beginning the 8-hour day. The contract contains no provision about that; it is silent on the subject. Mr. President, if a custom is established in that plant, whereby one-half hour's work, preliminary or postliminary, would be compensable, this bill provides that that practice or custom is null and void if it is inconsistent with the terms of the contract. If there is nothing in the contract on the subject, it might well be said that any agreement outside the contract would be inconsistent with it, and that therefore such work would not be compensable, even though both sides might agree to the practice, which would be established outside of the contract, and which might be inconsistent with it.

So, Mr. President, it seems to me that in writing this bill the committee has been most anxious to give voice to an immediate dismissal of all these lawsuits, thereby taking them out of the hands of the courts. No one knows what the courts' decisions will be. There has been only one trial which has come to any outstanding notice, and that is the trial before Judge Picard in Detroit. The decision in that case was appealed to the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court held that the activities described in the suit and in the decision might be compensable, and it remanded the case to Judge Picard's court, with instructions to determine how much the employees were entitled to, having in mind the de minimis rule. Judge Picard evidently took that hint of the Supreme Court as being worthy of his consideration, for he then held that all those cases came under the de minimis rule, and therefore he dismissed the entire suit—which I suppose will, in turn, come to the Supreme Court for further consideration; and inasmuch as the Supreme Court gave to the district court in Detroit that hint of what it might do—to take into consideration the de minimis rule—I imagine the Supreme Court itself might have that in mind, and perhaps will dismiss all these cases when they come to it.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. McMAHON. Can the Senator from Kentucky tell us what provisions of this measure have previously been before the Senate—for instance, at the last session—and have failed of passage, and what provisions which we have previously rejected are attempted to be run in here in order to have them adopted under the cover of this portal-to-portal legislation?

Mr. BARKLEY. I had in mind the Gwynne bill which passed the House of Representatives and came to the Senate. The Gwynne bill came to the Senate from the House of Representatives during the last session; but the Gwynne bill of the Seventy-ninth Congress is an entirely different measure from the Gwynne bill which the House of Representatives sent to the Senate a few days ago. There was nothing in the former Gwynne bill with respect to portal-to-portal pay. There was not a word in it with respect to amending the Walsh-Healey Act or the Bacon-Davis Act. So we cannot consider that the Gwynne bill which was passed by the House of Representatives during the last session has any real relationship to the measure now before us, except that the decision of the Supreme Court and the filing of these many fantastic cases have given a peg upon which to hang a hat of legislation which, if not designed to do so, at least is likely to do irreparable injury to millions of our people in years to come.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I appreciate the answer the Senator from Kentucky gave to the Senator from Connecticut, for the Gwynne bill which came to the Senate from the House of Representatives in the Seventy-ninth Congress did not contain any strictly portal-to-portal provisions.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is true.

Mr. WHERRY. It did have the good-faith reliance clause, and it was passed with that provision in it. Is that correct?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is correct.

Mr. WHERRY. Yes. I agree with the distinguished Senator that there was no portal-to-portal legislation in it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I wish to refer to the part of the bill which sets out the findings of the committee. I do not have time to discuss more than a portion of the bill. First the bill states that the Congress finds that certain horrid conditions exist in this country, endangering our commerce, our safety, our security, and threatening bankruptcy to many of our institutions. As a matter of fact, Mr. President, of the 550,000 corporations which come under the Fair Labor Standards Act on the average, and the more than 900,000 corporations that have come under it since its enactment because of the turnover in corporate existence, only a very few of them are involved in such suits, now brought or pending in the United States. Nevertheless, the asserted threat of bankruptcy to many of our institutions is set out in the bill as a reason for its enactment.

Then we find this:

> The Congress further finds and declares that all of the results which have arisen or may arise under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, as aforesaid, may (except as to liability for attorney's fees and, in the case of the Bacon-Davis Act, for liquidated damages) arise with respect to the Walsh-Healey and Bacon-Davis Acts and that it is, therefore, in the national public interest and for the general welfare, essential to national defense, and necessary to aid, protect, and foster commerce, that said Walsh-Healey Act and said Bacon-Davis Act be amended, as hereinafter set forth.

Mr. President, I have gone through the volume of hearings held by the Committee on the Judiciary, and in it I have not found a word with respect to either the Walsh-Healey Act or the Bacon-Davis Act. No witness who appeared before the committee urged or requested or suggested that the Walsh-Healey Act be amended or changed, or that provision for its change be included within this measure, or that the Bacon-Davis Act be amended or changed, or that provision for its amendment be included in this measure. Yet without a word of testimony, without a suggestion publicly made that the Walsh-Healey Act and the Bacon-Davis Act, as interpreted and enforced, endanger our national security and the national defense, the committee asks the Congress to find, in the absence of any basis whatever, that the amendments to the Walsh-Healey Act and the Bacon-Davis Act shall be included in the portal-to-portal legislation.

Mr. President, it has already been stated that there has not been a single lawsuit brought for recovery of compensation for portal-to-portal activities under the Walsh-Healey Act, and that act has been in existence since 1935. The Bacon-Davis Act has been in existence since 1931, and not a single lawsuit has been brought in any court to secure compensation for portal-to-portal activities under either one of these acts.

We have just fought a great war, the greatest war ever fought in all the annals of history. We played a magnificent part in that war. Both industry and labor, agriculture and finance, all of the activities, all of the resources, of our Nation were consolidated and organized in order to win that war. There was no complaint while the war was on, for more than 4 years, that the Walsh-Healey Act was interfering with our national defense. There was no suspicion brought even to Congress or in the public press, or before the American people, that the Bacon-Davis Act and its enforcement and its observance were interfering with our national defense. Yet we are told to find in the proposed law that the way these laws are being observed and enforced is a danger to our national defense, and that their change as recommended by the committee is necessary in order that our national life may be preserved in our effort to defend it.

Mr. President, I decline to make any such finding on my part. I decline to join any other Members of this body in making any such finding, because it is a false finding, it is based on no testimony, no record, no circumstance, that gives justification for the amendments which are included in the bill with respect to the Walsh-Healey Act or the Bacon-Davis Act.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator was unavoidably absent the other day when the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. McGRATH] made a remarkable address upon this question. He discussed thoroughly the Bacon-Davis Act and the Walsh-Healey Act and, as I recall, he said in the address that $50,000,000,000 was spent under the Bacon-Davis Act and the Walsh-Healey Act, and not one complaint was ever made, not one lawsuit was instituted, nothing happened in the spending of all that money, which would give any committee in the United States Congress the right or opportunity to bring the Bacon-Davis Act or even the Walsh-Healey Act under this kind of a bill.

One further observation. It is worth while to repeat that when the committee started the question of portal-to-portal legislation, it first reported out a bill which dealt solely with the portal-to-portal cases, then for some cause or other the bill was sent back to the committee, and it came back with many additions. I wonder if the committee, like a prizefighter, has a little overtrained in its zeal to bring in something that would be perfect.

Mr. BARKLEY. I was not privileged to hear the speech of the Senator from Rhode Island, but since I returned to Washington I have read it with great admiration and with much profit and benefit, and I hasten to join those who have already congratulated him upon it. In view of its exhaustive discussion of the bill and its implications, it seems like a work of supererogation for me or anyone else to attempt to add anything to it. But there is a strange mystery about how the bill in is present form came before us, because the original bill, Senate bill 70, was not reported to the Senate until after all the hearings had been concluded, and based upon those hearings the committee reported Senate bill 70. Then it was returned to the committee, and while it was back in the committee, it wrote in the provisions amending the Walsh-Healey Act and the Bacon-Davis Act.

The only explanation I can make—and I hope it is not an offensive explanation—is that the committee decided that it would go as far as possible while the going was good, and would add amendments to legislation which had been in effect for 10 or 15 years without complaint, without any justification for the fear that either one of the acts was being misinterpreted or badly administered by the Government of the United States.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. In that connection, does the Senator make a distinction between the part of the bill which relates to the past claims and that part relating to future claims, with regard to the real purpose of the bill, and the reason for its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary? It occurs to me that the only jurisdiction we had in mind, and, I may say, the Presiding Officer had in mind when referring such a bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, to deal with a situation which arose somewhat by surprise, was not with the intention of laying down a substitute for labor's future actions.

Mr. BARKLEY. There is a distinction, certainly; there should be a distinction, if Congress feels itself called upon to dismiss all these actions instead of letting the judges do it; and that is what the proposed legislation does. It just dismisses all the cases en masse, without regard to whether any of them have merit or not. It would be inconceivable that this many lawsuits could be brought without some of them probably having some merit. But what gave rise to the legislation was a desire to dismiss the cases, and do it fast, and quick, and now. The committee is not willing to leave it to the judges, every one of whom might dismiss the action, as Judge Picard dismissed those in Detroit. Congress is not willing to leave the cases to the courts; it wants to dismiss the cases at once. But while dismissing these cases already brought, the proponents of the bill project a dismissal, a prospective dismissal, into all the years of the future, and amend the labor laws of the land, which were not sponsored by the Committee on the Judiciary, but by other committees of the Senate and the House of Representatives. Without criticizing the committee, I feel that it went beyond the purview of the proposal before it as it was originally conceived, in order to amend the Labor Relations Act, the Walsh-Healey Act, and the Bacon-Davis Act, which were sponsored by other committees of both the House and the Senate.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I thank the Senator for his last remark. What I had special reference to was that if we are to amend for the future substantive labor legislation, it properly should be done on recommendation of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

Mr. BARKLEY. I thoroughly agree with that. Of course, the Presiding Officer said, at the time he made reference of the bill, that it might with equal propriety have been referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare; but it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and I suppose that, like all committees, that committee felt that it was commissioned to deal with the entire subject growing out of the litigation. I do not myself adhere to that theory.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I have occupied more time than I intended to take, but I yield to my colleague.

Mr. COOPER. I should like to ask the Senator whether, in his analysis of the amendment, it appears to him that the amendment invalidates existing claims exactly in the way the committee bill accomplishes that result.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; I think that in all likelihood, under a proper interpretation of the substitute, so far as language is concerned, it invalidates them, but it does not invalidate compensable claims which may be filed in the future, which the bill from the committee does.

Mr. COOPER. In respect to past claims, is it not true that the committee bill and the amendment accomplish the same result?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is why I said at the outset that there are some things in the substitute to which I do no adhere.

Mr. COOPER. I was interested in the Senator's statement that he deprecated the tendency of legislative bodies to anticipate decisions of the courts in retroactively invalidating these claims. Is it not true that the amendment would likewise anticipate the action of the Supreme Court?

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, yes; I agree with that interpretation as to past portal-to-portal liabilities.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. McGRATH. In the short time the Senator has had in which to study the language of the committee's bill and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada and myself, I think the Senator from Kentucky has not become aware of the fact that there is a very distinct difference between the two approaches.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am certainly happy to have the Senator point that out, but I had understood the Senator from Nevada yesterday during his discussion to make the statement—and that is largely the basis for my answer—that so far as past claims were concerned, the McCarran amendment substantially did what the committee bill does.

Mr. McGRATH. I may say to the Senator that it does that, so far as portal-to-portal claims are concerned; that is, what are known as "portal-to-portal" claims. But it does not attempt to take out of court persons who probably have claims now pending under the Fair Labor Standards Act that do not come within what we conceive to be the portal-to-portal theory.

Mr. BARKLEY. In other words, then, the difference is that the committee bill regards all these lawsuits as being based upon portal-to-portal activities, which they outlaw, whereas the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island and the Senator from Nevada distinguishes between strictly portal-to-portal claims and other claims which may be legitimate and have merit?

Mr. McGRATH. That is correct; and, if the Senator will yield to me for a moment, I shall try, as simply as possible, to explain this distinction.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am happy to yield.

Mr. McGRATH. First, I refer the Senator to the language of the committee bill on page 11, line 7, and to the language of the proposed McCarran-McGrath amendment, on page 2, line 14. I may say that the Senators supporting the committee substitute have reiterated here on the floor that with respect to past claims there is no difference between the committee substitute and the McCarran-McGrath amendment. Even if this were true, it would hardly lessen the argument for the amendment, since adoption of the amendment would at least preserve the Fair Labor Standards Act for the future, and the committee substitute would, in my opinion, torpedo it. But the committee substitute and the proposed amendments are not alike in past effect, except with respect to what are really portal-to-portal claims which would be wiped out by both bills.

The difficulty in seeing the difference has perhaps arisen from the fact that Senators making a comparison have not read the entire language of the comparable provisions. The difference lies in the use in the committee substitute of the words to which I have referred, "except those activities which were compensable by either" contract, custom, or practice, as against the use in the minority amendment of the words, "to the extent that such claim involves such activities of an employee as were not compensable working time."

If I may, I should like further to elaborate on that. The committee substitute in effect does this: It looks to the contract, it looks to the custom, and it looks to the practice, to determine only one question, and that is what activity, by that custom or contract, has been made specifically compensable? The minority approach and the minority amendment look to the contract, to be sure, to the custom and the practice; but it looks to it to determine what was working time—and that is the basic difference—and the extent to which the claim is for activities which were not working time under either a contract or by a custom or practice. Working time is the precise question involved in portal-to-portal suits, not compensability. If in connection with any specific case there should be no question about whether the activities engaged in were work, the proposed minority amendment would not wipe out the claim; but as against this proposition the committee substitute would wipe out any claims not involving in any way the question of what was or was not, or what is work, simply because the activity upon which such claim might be based was not specifically made compensable by the contract, by the custom, or by the practice.

Furthermore, the language of the committee substitute would operate to divest employees of their rights under claims which might be clearly equitable, and which might involve no question at all with respect to what was work. It might divest employees of their rights under such claims solely because some employer had a contract or had established a custom or a practice to the effect that the particular activities engaged in were not to be compensated.

I hope I have made clear the difference in approach.

Mr. BARKLEY. I thank the Senator for calling my attention to that distinction, which is a very vital distinction. As I see it, the committee bill has included in its scope what has always been understood as portal-to-portal activities, and outlaws all of them.

Mr. McGRATH. The phrase "portal-to-portal activities" means working time, not compensability.

Mr. BARKLEY. The substitute offered by the two Senators makes that very just distinction, in order that every claim, whether portal-to-portal or not, may not be wiped out at one fell swoop by an act of Congress.

Mr. McGRATH. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BARKLEY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. McGRATH. I should be glad to put into the RECORD along with these remarks which the Senator has permitted me to make the references which clearly will point out the distinct difference in approach as between the committee bill and that proposed by the minority. Those references are, as I said in the beginning, the language used in the committee bill, page 11, line 7, which refers to activities which shall not be paid for, except such as are compensable either by express contract, written or nonwritten, and so forth; and, as against that, the language used in the minority bill, appearing on page 2, line 14, which excludes only activities which were not compensable as "working time," either under an express provision of a written contract or otherwise.

Mr. BARKLEY. I thank the Senator for that interpolation.

Mr. President, I desire to conclude. I want to make merely this observation. I object also to the 2-year limitation, because it is practically a cutting in half of the average of the limitations in existence now in all the States. In my State the statute of limitations provides 5 years, in some States it is 6, in some it is 1 or 2. The average is slightly under 4 years, whereas the committee bill makes it 2 years. The substitute makes it 3, which it seems to me is fair. It is more than fair to industries in States where the limitation is 5, 6, or even 4 years; and it is not unfair to those in States where the limitation is only 1 or 2 years.

Mr. President, I should like to vote for some legislation dealing with this situation, inasmuch as it has been injected here, though I have an abiding faith that, if a little time had been allowed, the courts could have adjusted this difficulty and settled it to the entire satisfaction of business and labor and the people. I would not object, and I would be glad to vote for some bill that relieved business of any harassment on account of inconsequential and trifling lawsuits. But, Mr. President, unless this bill is amended either by the adoption of the substitute or by other amendments that go to the objections which I have raised to the committee bill, I do not see how in good conscience I can cast my vote in favor of the legislation reported by the committee.

I apologize to the Senate for consuming more time than I had intended. We frequently do that here without intending to do so. But I did want my views upon the implications and far-reaching consequences of this legislation made a matter of record in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky yield to me for an inquiry?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I have yielded the floor.

Mr. DONNELL. Would the Senator answer an inquiry, please?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. DONNELL. I wanted to be sure that I understood the Senator earlier in his remarks. Did he refer to what he termed the "hysteria" under which the country is now laboring?

Mr. BARKLEY. I referred to it in quotations, because it had been referred to in other discussions of this legislation in my absence, and I referred to it not as an original expression of my own but as a quotation from other Senators who had discussed the subject.

Mr. DONNELL. May I ask the Senator whether he shares in the view that the country is experiencing a hysteria over this matter at this time?

Mr. BARKLEY. I think a good deal of excitement was whipped up on the subject. I did not say that everybody was afflicted with hysteria. I think that some legislators, without identifying any of them, were afflicted with it.

Mr. DONNELL. May I ask the Senator whether he regards the economic situation that has been presented by the portal-to-portal cases as being such as seriously to require the attention of Congress?

Mr. BARKLEY. If it were conceivable that all the courts in which these cases are pending would render judgment for the entire $5,000,000,000 involved in all the lawsuits, it would present a serious situation. But to me that result is utterly inconceivable, and it is as inconceivable and as fantastic as some of the suits themselves that have been brought upon the subject.

Mr. DONNELL. May I ask the Senator whether or not he regards the pendency of $5,785,000,000 of claims, plus 398 suits with an indeterminate amount as a trivial consequence regardless of the ultimate outcome?

Mr. BARKLEY. I did not use the word "trivial." I think many of the suits involve trivial claims; I am frank to say that. As I said, I am a lawyer by profession. I used to bring lawsuits. Frequently I brought a lawsuit for more than I thought I would obtain when I submitted it to the jury, and my prognostications in that respect rarely failed. I hardly ever received what I asked for in a lawsuit. And it would be utterly inconceivable to me that the Federal courts or any other courts would render judgment for all these claims that have been added up to a total of $5,000,000,000. It is utterly fantastic to think that the courts would do it. And the substitute offered by the two Senators who are members of the committee will answer the question proposed by the Senator from Missouri anyway, because it deals with claims that are legitimate portal-to-portal activities in a way which has been described and which I shall not now further discuss.

Mr. DONNELL. May I ask the Senator if he has had the opportunity to read the statement of Under Secretary Royall as to the figures of possible liability of the United States Government?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; I have read hastily all the hearings. I am not disturbed by that. And I would not deny to any American citizen any right he enjoys under the Constitution because it might take a dollar or two out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further inquiry?

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Missouri, I understand, is going to take his own time to discuss this matter. I have concluded my remarks, but I yield one more time.

Mr. DONNELL. The Senator has given us the benefit of his views on this subject, and I should like to have some further elucidation, if he has no objection.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will let the Senator cross-examine me one more time.

Mr. DONNELL. Very well. I ask the Senator whether or not he agrees with this expression contained in the petition for a writ of certiorari in the Mount Clemens Pottery Co. case filed on yesterday by the Attorney General of the United States:

Since the decision in this case, which was handed down in June 1946, numerous suits seeking very substantial sums, purporting to rest on that decision, have been filed throughout the country. Prompt and definitive adjudication of the proper application of the de minimis rule in this case will serve to facilitate the disposition of this multitude of cases which now threatens to embarrass judicial administration in both Federal and State courts and to disrupt industrial relations in the period of reconversion.

Does the Senator agree with that expression?

Mr. BARKLEY. I have not read the Attorney General's petition in that matter. I have the greatest respect for the Attorney General of the United States. I think he is endeavoring to perform his duty in an outstanding way and in a very successful way. The petition he files deals with the Mount Clemens case, which revolves around the Fair Labor Standards Act. It has no relationship to the bill now pending, which includes both the Walsh-Healey Act and the Bacon-Davis Act, and, so far as I know, there is nothing in the activity of the Attorney General that in any way involves these two acts which have been lugged in here, in my judgment, unnecessarily and improperly.

Regardless of that, the Attorney General has his duties to perform as the Attorney General of the United States, the chief law officer of this great Nation, and I admire the way in which he is performing his duties. I have my duty here as a Senator, and I seek to perform that duty according to the lights I have, and shall continue to do so, I hope.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just one further question?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. DONNELL. I ask the Senator whether he agrees with this statement, made by the subcommittee of the Business Advisory Council of the Department of Commerce of the United States:

Whatever the final amounts which might be awarded by the courts if the present judicial interpretation stands, it is clear that the extent of litigation, the cost of defense, and the potential liabilities constitute such a burden on industry as to force many companies into bankruptcy and to disrupt seriously the whole economy.

Mr. BARKLEY. I should want to read the entire statement before I decided that I agreed with that language.

Mr. DONNELL. This is a statement by a subcommittee of the Business Advisory Council of the Department of Commerce of the United States.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not like to have one paragraph or one sentence lifted out of a discussion of some length and to be asked whether I agree with it. It depends altogether on the basis upon which the statement was made. I do not think I agree necessarily with all the implications that are involved in the statement read by the Senator, but I would want to read the whole statement in order fairly to determine whether I agree with it as a whole or not. It seems to me that it sheds no light upon this discussion or upon the wisdom of the proposed legislation for me to be catechized about how many different organizations I want to line up with in regard to this legislation, either for or against it. I have my own opinions about it, and they are not superinduced by the recommendations of any organization, labor organization, business organization, chamber of commerce, manufacturers' organization or any other organization. I have arrived at my conclusions by processes that are satisfactory to me, although they may not be satisfactory to anyone else.

Mr. DONNELL. May I ask the Senator one final question, and that is whether or not he is acquainted with Mr. Robert T. Caldwell, general counsel of the Associated Industries of Kentucky?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes, I know Mr. Caldwell. He is an able lawyer in Kentucky. He represents the Associated Industries of Kentucky, and he is one of my warmest friends, one of my lifelong friends, and I have for him and his ability and his character the highest esteem, and I cherish him as a devoted personal friend. We do not always agree.

Mr. DONNELL. I thank the Senator.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Is it the purpose of the Senator from Missouri to speak at length?

Mr. DONNELL. I shall probably speak for about an hour.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Will the Senator be good enough to yield to me to make a brief statement of my position on this measure before he takes the floor?

Mr. DONNELL. I shall do so if I may have unanimous consent to retain the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the only way in which the Senator can retain the floor. Is there objection to the Senator from Missouri yielding to the Senator from Wyoming under the announced circumstances? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Wyoming is recognized.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I desire to have in the RECORD a brief statement of my views upon this measure and a statement of my reasons for supporting the substitute proposed by the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] and the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. MCGRATH].

I have listened with a great deal of interest and attention to the debate yesterday and today, and particularly to the questions which were directed a few moments ago to the minority leader [Mr. BARKLEY] by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL]. I have a very clear feeling that the majority of the Judiciary Committee has brought in a bill based upon apprehensions which have arisen in the minds of some industrialists about the effect of portal-to-portal suits which have been filed. In the guise of correcting the situation created by the Supreme Court's decision in the Mount Clemens case the majority is seeking not merely to correct that difficulty, but to go far afield and strike down labor legislation against which there has been no attack whatever in the past.

The trouble about the portal-to-portal suits began when the Supreme Court handed down the Mount Clemens decision under the Fair Labor Standards Act. The basis of every claim for compensation for portal-to-portal working time, so to speak, was to be found in the Fair Labor Standards Act itself. In other words, the claims were statutory claims. To correct the portal-to-portal difficulty, therefore, it was necessary only to go to the Fair Labor Standards Act itself, and to modify, amend, or repeal the statutory language in that act which gave rise to the suits.

That is precisely what the substitute does. It submits to the Senate the opportunity to vote for an amendment of the Fair Labor Standards Act. The proposed substitute reads, in part, as follows:

SEC. 201. The second sentence of subsection 16 (b) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended to read as follows:

It is not necessary to read the amendment. It is only necessary to call attention to the debate which took place here yesterday and today, in which it was agreed upon both sides that insofar as past activities are concerned, and insofar as portal-to-portal activities are concerned, this language of the substitute is very little different in purpose from part II of the bill reported by the committee, and, therefore, it will cover the case so far as the past is concerned.

But the committee was not content to solve the precise question which arose. The committee was not content to correct the difficulty which might come from unwarranted interpretations of the Fair Labor Standards Act, or warranted interpretations, to make compensable activities which were not conceived to be compensable at the time they were performed in the past. The committee was not content to correct the retroactive effect which might follow from the Mount Clemens decision. It was not content to deal with the precise subject which has been giving concern, if any concern has been felt, to employers and employees. The committee went far afield. It went into the future. It went into the undermining of the Bacon-Davis Act and the Walsh-Healey Act, neither of which, as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] has so ably pointed out, has ever been productive of any such interpretation as that which followed from the Mount Clemens case. So the majority of the Judiciary Committee is seeking to go far beyond the effect of the Fair Labor Standards Act. I can see no explanation for that course except a desire upon the part of a majority of the committee to accede to the demand which has arisen from shortsighted employers who would strike down the gains which have been achieved for labor.

That is not a wild interpretation, when one reads the language which we are asked to support. I know of no way to interpret a law or a proposed law except to read it. I know of no way to determine what legislators mean except by reading what they say. We are asked to believe that this bill deals solely with portal-to-portal activities. How can anyone who reads the bill reach such a conclusion? It is easy to bring here editorials from newspapers, quotations from attorneys, quotations from the Attorney General of the United States, and quotations from the economic advisers to the Secretary of Commerce, who are dealing with a substantive fact, a fact which is taken care of by the minority substitute. But those quotations have no relevancy whatever with respect to the language of this measure, unless we understand precisely what that language says.

Let me read significant sentences from part II of the committee bill. Section 2 is entitled:

Relief From Portal-to-Portal Claims Under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as Amended, the Walsh-Healey, and the Bacon-Davis Acts.

I digress to say that there have never been any portal-to-portal claims under two of those acts in all the years they have been on the statute books. But the title, let us observe, is "Relief From Portal-to-Portal Claims Under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as Amended, the Walsh-Healey, and the Bacon-Davis Acts." Is that what the committee proposes to do? Let us read on:

No employer shall be subject to any liability—

Observe the word "any"— or punishment under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, the Walsh-Healey Act, or the Bacon-Davis Act on account of the failure of such employer to pay an employee minimum wages, or to pay an employee overtime compensation, for or on account of any activities of an employee engaged in prior to the date of enactment of this act, except those activities which were compensable by either—

(1) an express provision of a written or nonwritten contract in effect, at the time of such activity, between such employee, his agent, or collective-bargaining representative and his employer; or

(2) a custom or practice in effect, at the time of such activity, at the establishment or other place where such employee was employed, covering such activity, not inconsistent with a written or nonwritten contract, in effect at the time of such activity, between such employee, his agent, or collective-bargaining representative and his employer.

I call attention to the phrase in line 5, of page 11, "on account of any activities." If that means anything, it means precisely that there shall be no compensation with reference to minimum wage, or for overtime in connection with any activity—not simply any portal-to-portal activity because the phrase "portal-to-portal activities" is not used; it says "any activities"—unless those activities come within the exception set forth in clauses 1 and 2.

Is that a strained construction? Mr. President, no lawyer can construe any bill or any statute except by reading the language and comparing one phrase with another.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. If the Senator will bear with me just for a moment longer.

So, Mr. President, when I say that the language which I have just read goes far beyond the question of portal-to-portal activities, I undertake to prove it by referring to the language which is contained in the clause beginning in line 19 of the same page, which is part of the same section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FLANDERS in the chair). The Chair understands that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL] really has the floor.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. And he had unanimous consent to yield to me for a statement. I hope that I shall not trespass too long upon the time of the Senate.

Mr. DONNELL. I am very happy to yield. I assume the Senator will not consume much additional time.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I shall not consume much additional time. I shall be frank with the Senator. On Monday I was out of the city making a St. Patrick's day speech, while the Senator consumed approximately 5 hours in explanation of the bill. I hope that I shall not take more than 10 minutes, in addition, to make clear my position. I shall try to do so in less time than that.

Mr. DONNELL. I appreciate the Senator's attitude. I call attention to the fact that the Senate is to vote at 3 o'clock As I have stated, I anticipate that my remarks will take probably an hour.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am sure the Senator will not begrudge me 20 minutes if he is going to take an hour.

Mr. DONNELL. I have the floor, of course, and I do not desire to yield the floor for an indefinite period.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Indeed not.

Mr. DONNELL. I shall appreciate the Senator's cooperation to that end.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator will find me cooperative.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I want it clear that the Senator from Missouri has the floor and that the yielding is being done by the Senator from Missouri.

(At this point Mr. DONNELL yielded to Mr. REVERCOMB, who submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to Senate Joint Resolution 77, which appears elsewhere under an appropriate heading.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggests to the Senator from Wyoming that he might cut his time down to 5 minutes under the circumstances.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, there have been many new procedures introduced in the Senate since it assembled under the new majority on the 3d of January, but I am frank to say that this is the first time I have ever heard a Presiding Officer undertake to limit a Senator. The only comparable occasion that I can recall was when the former Republican Vice President, the distinguished Mr. Charles Dawes, was sworn in as Vice President. When Senators who were elected that year were about to be sworn in, Mr. Dawes, with a grand gesture, said, "Let them all be sworn in at one time." For some reason or other our friends of the majority seem to think that the whole show belongs to them.

I have made my point clear. I shall endeavor to make my remarks as brief and as succinct as possible, and I hope I shall not trespass upon the indulgence of either the Senator from Missouri or the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The fact is, nevertheless, that the Senator from Wyoming is speaking by courtesy of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, he received unaimous consent of the Senate. But I shall not trespass. I suggest that we are taking up much of the Senate's valuable time by this discussion. I might have concluded.

I was citing the language beginning on page 11:

For the purposes of this section, no judicial or administrative interpretation of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, the Walsh-Healey Act, or the Bacon-Davis Act, shall have the effect of changing any written or nonwritten contract between the employer and employee so as to make compensable any portal-to-portal activities.

I pause to emphasize that phrase. In line 24, on page 11, we find the phrase "any portal-to-portal activities"; but in line 5, on page 11, the significant words "portal-to-portal" are omitted, and the only word used is "activities." So that the first part of this section is an exemption for employers from any liability under either law to pay overtime or minimum wages for any activity.

Any lawyer attempting to construe this language, any court attempting to construe it, will read those two clauses and compare them, and the inevitable conclusion will be that when the Congress wrote "portal-to-portal activities" in one place and omitted it in another place it had a specific purpose for doing so.

Mr. President, I could take much more time than under the circumstances will be allotted to me to analyze other obvious inconsistencies in this bill, as, for example, the inconsistency to which I alluded a little while earlier during the speech of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] in which part II undertakes to refer the reader, the court, the employer, the employee, to a definition of "portal-to-portal activities" in section 5. When we turn to section 5 we find the same language referring back to the section from which we came. So that we have a beautiful "runaround," and we wind up reading all part II without knowing what the authors of the bill had in mind when they talk about portal-to-portal activities.

It seems to me that this is clear reason to support the substitute offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. MCGRATH].

Let me add another word. I am rather inclined to believe that our friends of the majority are acting in panic. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL] a little while ago asked the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] whether or not he thought there was any hysteria abroad in the land. I think there has been considerable hysteria upon the other side of the aisle, both here and in the House of Representatives. It is a hysteria which has been exemplified by the round robin of 16 freshmen Senators who wanted to be consulted in conferences held by the policy committee on the majority side. Hysteria has been indicated by speeches upon the floor—"We are not doing enough. The Republican Party is falling down. The Republican Party is not carrying out its pledges." Hysteria is expressed in the talk about reducing taxes 20 percent across the board, and cutting expenditures, while at the same time our Republican friends are urging bills which call for additional expenditures for which there has been no budget estimate. There is hysteria promoted by the fact that the majority party made its campaign in November 1946 upon the ground that it was going to cut down the activities of the Federal Government in Washington; and now, though this Congress is less than 3 months old, the record of the Senate and of the House are filled with bills increasing the activities of the Federal Government and increasing the expenditures, and at the same time every financial record which is available to us demonstrates beyond the slightest possibility of contradiction that this country today is enjoying great prosperity.

Last night it was the privilege of a great many Members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives and of the executive departments and of the courts to be the guests of Life magazine at the Statler Hotel, where a motion picture was displayed.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I assume that the Senator from Wyoming was present at the gathering, last evening, to which he has referred.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Indeed I was.

Mr. DONNELL. I suggest that it is not necessary to consume the time of the Senate by referring to the Life magazine party of last evening. We are giving consideration to the portal-to-portal bill, and I shall ask the Senator from Wyoming to desist from such remarks and to complete his remarks on the portal-to-portal bill in 2 minutes. At that time I shall take the floor.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri is most generous. I cannot complain at his request, and I shall desist. I referred to the motion picture displayed by Life magazine because it was a visual demonstration to all who were there of the teeming prosperity of the United States. Every part of that picture was a demonstration that the findings of fact submitted by the majority of the committee in connection with this bill are without any basis at all, but simply are findings written in a desire, it seems to me, to cut down what labor has gained.

Mr. President, there has been handed to me an article written by the Reverend George G. Higgins, assistant director of the social action department of the National Catholic Welfare Council. In the article he refers to an article published in the New York Times a few days ago about the tremendously high prices industry is charging and about the necessity for reducing prices and the failure of industry to act. Then he says this:

> Is there any reason to anticipate that American industry will accept Mr. Porter's challenge and take advantage of its 60- to 90-day reprieve? Let's hope there is; but let's also face up squarely to the facts.
> One fact that makes for discouragement and pessimism is the outlandish attack currently waged on the Fair Labor Standards Act—an attack which hasn't, as yet, been publicly disowned or disavowed by the National Association of Manufacturers, or by any of the other major business organizations, the very groups to which Mr. Porter is appealing to save the day for industry.
> The House of Representatives has already passed H. R. 2157 which, under cover of finding a remedy for the recent flurry of portal-to-portal suits, deliberately goes out of its way to include a series of amendments that would seriously weaken the very substance of the original act.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire article be printed at this point in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, so that I may thus save time and not impinge upon the extra 2 minutes which the Senator from Missouri has so graciously allowed me.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE YARDSTICK—CATHOLIC TESTS OF A SOCIAL ORDER

(By Rev. George G. Higgins, assistant director, social action department, National Catholic Welfare Conference)

PUBLIC RELATIONS IN REVERSE—PUBLIC-RELATIONS PROBLEM PRESSED UPON MANAGEMENT—NEW RELATIONS WITH WORKERS AND CUSTOMERS SEEN NECESSITATED BY PRICE OUTLOOK

The public-relations problem, to which this headline in the New York Times refers, is the problem which is posed in part by the fact that at the recent convention of the American Management Association in Chicago "everybody, rich, poor, or in-between, was talking about the huge profits being reported and the fat dividend melons being cut by many of the country's large corporations." (Let it be remembered that this was a convention of businessmen and management representatives; there were no trade-unionists around.)

Russel Porter, the enterprising business analyst of the Times, is disarmingly and somewhat unexpectedly frank about the seriousness of the fix in which American industry finds itself today. He is equally outspoken and equally forthright in admonishing the American business community that this is the acceptable time to redeem itself in the eyes of the general public.

THE OTHER FELLOW

"Many businessmen," Mr. Porter says, "concede privately that prices are too high and should be reduced voluntarily and gradually now in order to stop the inflationary spiral and forestall the deflationary one that might follow a forced and sharp break in prices later. But, with a few exceptions, everybody seems to be waiting for the other fellow's prices to be cut first."

It is to be hoped that American businessmen will take Mr. Porter's word for it when he says that "the time is getting close when industry must find an answer to this problem that will satisfy the public." He speaks rather ominously in terms of 60 to 90 days—after which dead line American industry may reasonably expect a show-down. A word to the wise is sufficient, particularly when it comes from the sympathetic typewriter of an acknowledged friend of the system.

According to Mr. Porter the future public relations of American industry will have to be based upon two foundations: Action in the public interest, and full public information. And since actions speak louder than words, the first of these is by far the more important.

FACING THE FACTS

Is there any reason to anticipate that American industry will accept Mr. Porter's challenge and take advantage of its 60- to 90-day reprieve? Let's hope that there is; but let's also face up squarely to the facts.

One fact that makes for discouragement and pessimism is the outlandish attack currently waged on the Fair Labor Standards Act—an attack which hasn't, as yet, been publicly disowned or disavowed by the National Association of Manufacturers, or by any of the other major business organizations, the very groups to which Mr. Porter is appealing to save the day for industry.

The House of Representatives has already passed H. R. 2157 which, under cover of finding a remedy for the recent flurry of portal-to-portal suits, deliberately goes out of its way to include a series of amendments that would seriously weaken the very substance of the original act.

The House bill gives workers only 1 year to file claims under the Fair Labor Standards Act—a statute of limitations unique in American law, since in almost every other type of business proceeding, from three to seven or more years are provided. It also allows workers and employers to settle wage claims under the wages-and-hours law out of court, thereby giving employers—particularly in nonunion shops—an easy way of violating both the spirit and the letter of the original act by settling their damages at bargain rates. Finally, by setting up standards of custom and good faith, it opens for unscrupulous employers a very wide door through which to escape the wages-and-hours law provisions. An employer will be able to argue that his alleged violation of the law was done in good faith, and having established his claim, will thereby become immune to damages.

MOTIVES QUESTIONED

It is asking a lot of human nature to believe that the motives of the proponents of these amendments are sincere. But motives and intentions aside, the fact is that the amendments will inevitably work a further hardship on the substandard workers of the Nation. Instead of improving upon the Fair Labor Standards Act (the present statutory minimum of 40 cents an hour is obviously only a pittence) and instead of facilitating its administration, American industry—if only by its very significant silence—consents to a set of amendments which will almost cut the heart out of the act and will set up almost insurmountable barriers to its effective administration.

Mr. Porter talks about public relations. Well, here it is. This is public relations in reverse. And if this is the best that American industry can do, the show is all over. The NAM will never meet Mr. Porter's dead line. Let's prepare for the show-down.

Come the next convention of the American Management Association, Mr. Porter will probably be writing a column on the text that "there are none so blind as those who will not see." Maybe not—but time's awasting.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me? I wish to ask a question of the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, in order that the record may be clear, let me inquire whether the Senator from Missouri has the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri does have the floor.

Mr. DONNELL. I now yield to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], to permit him to ask a question of the Senator from Wyoming; and thereafter I shall yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Wyoming, to permit him to reply to the question.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, in his last statement the Senator from Wyoming said that the committee bill destroys or tends to destroy the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. I wish to inquire whether the Senator from Wyoming is aware of the provision of the McCarran amendment which goes much further than the committee bill, in that it not only relieves employers of liquidated damages, but also relieves them of unpaid minimum wages and unpaid overtime compensation.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes, Mr. President; I am well aware of that fact, and I am glad the Senator from Kentucky has given me an opportunity to point it out.

The distinction is this: The committee bill not only deals with activities which took place in the past, but it also deals with future activities; whereas the amendment which has been offered as a substitute deals only with portal-to-portal activities which have occurred in the past, prior to the enactment of this bill. That is why I consider it immensely superior to the committee bill.

Furthermore, I say to the Senator, the great defect of the committee bill is its vagueness of language, the use of the expression "portal-to-portal" in some places and its abandonment in other places, the invasion of the field of the Walsh-Healey Act and the Bacon-Davis Act, and the attempt to abolish all future claims which may arise.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, with all due regard to the statement which has been made, I shall like to return to my question. If the Senator from Wyoming will read those two sections, I think he will find that the McCarran amendment relates to future claims as well as to past claims, and that it goes much further than the committee bill does, in that the amendment relieves employers of liability, not only for liquidated damages, but also for minimum wages and overtime compensation.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, under the time limitation I cannot take much more time; but I shall ask the Senator from Kentucky, if he will be kind enough to do so, to ask the Senator from Missouri, when he undertakes his hour's speech, to tell the Senate why the words "portal-to-portal" were left out of line 5, before the word "activities," and why the bill proposes to define portal-to-portal activities in section 5, and yet section 5 refers the reader to section 2. I think it will be very illuminating to have some explanation of those points.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, let me inquire to what line 5 the Senator from Wyoming is referring. There are several pages to the bill.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I refer to line 5, on page 11, which I have mentioned several times.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I have listened this afternoon with very great interest to the remarks of both the distinguished Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] and the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], who is the leader of the minority. The Senator from Kentucky, in the concluding portion of his response to an inquiry, stated that he knows Mr. Robert T. Caldwell very well, that he is a warm personal friend of his, and is a lawyer of high standing in Kentucky. It happens, Mr. President, that Mr. Caldwell was one of the witnesses before the subcommittee which had to do with the matter of portal-to-portal pay. I shall quote just a few sentences from the testimony of that gentleman, as to whose ability and, I judge, high standing the senior Senator from Kentucky has spoken this afternoon so eloquently and glowingly. Mr. Caldwell said, as shown at page 380 of the hearings:

> My statement will be directed primarily to a factual discussion of the situation in industry which now exists as a result of the Supreme Court's successive portal-to-portal decisions, culminating with the Mount Clemens Pottery case; a demonstration of the impossibility of the average employer's compliance with the requirements of those decisions; and the urgent necessity of immediate congressional action.

Further, at page 404, I quote one other sentence from Mr. Caldwell's testimony:

> As compared with the disastrous effects on industry generally if these portal-to-portal suits are permitted to be prosecuted in their present form and within existing limitations, it should be noted that no remotely comparable burden will be placed on the employees if they are eliminated.

Mr. President, the senior Senator from Kentucky argues that the legislation as proposed will set aside the action of courts; that it will invalidate claims which, by the Mount Clemens decision, were permitted to be sustained under the very language of the act as being contrary to custom and contract likewise.

I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that in this proposed congressional enactment we are not in the slightest impinging upon the jurisdiction of the judicial department of the Government, for, after all, what body is it in the Government of the United States which declares the policy of the Government? Is it the Supreme Court of the United States, a body of nine men appointed by the President of the United States? Under the last preceding administration so many of those men were appointed that obviously their selection was induced in large part by the opinions of one man, the President of the United States.

I undertake to say that it is wise that the founding fathers of our country placed in Congress, not in the Supreme Court, the power to declare the policy of the United States. I may say further that when some years ago an effort was made to pack the Supreme Court, by a device which was submitted to the Congress, as I recall, by the then President of the United States, there was an uprising of popular indignation from one end of the Nation to the other, because it was believed by the people that the packing of the Supreme Court was an effort to place in the Court the actual policy-making power, to place in the Court, with its final powers of disposition of litigation, the power to determine what should be the economic and, perhaps, financial policy of this Nation.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry, as to whether or not the amendment which I mentioned in the course of my speech night before last is officially before the Senate. In the course of that speech I referred to a proposed amendment to the substitute amendment, on page 3, line 5, an amendment which is in writing and at the desk, proposing to substitute the word "two" for the word "three."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment has not been stated from the desk. The amendment the Senate is considering is the one offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] on behalf of himself and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. MCGRATH].

Mr. MORSE. With the further indulgence of the Senator from Missouri, may I ask if the junior Senator from Oregon would be in order if he offered the amendment at this time?

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I do not yield for that purpose. May I say that, inasmuch as possibly 20 to 25 minutes of the time which I had at my disposal, having the floor, has already been consumed, I shall request Senators to kindly refrain from interruptions to my remarks? I shall endeavor, at the conclusion, to answer any questions I can answer, but I am sure Senators will realize that we have had, on behalf of the Senators from Nevada and Rhode Island and Kentucky and Wyoming, and possibly others I do not for the moment recall, a very considerable exposition of their views concerning the McCarran-McGrath amendment. I deem it to be my duty, as well as my privilege, to reply to the arguments which have been advanced with respect to that amendment.

Mr. President, in connection with the argument which has been made this afternoon by the Senators who have spoken on the other side, I understand that they take the view generally that, as the Senator from Rhode Island explained it as his opinion the other day, the proposal now before the Senate is "much ado about nothing," or, as he finally stated, after conceding that he had not examined the court files in a single one of the 1,915 cases on file, "much ado," he said, "about little."

Perhaps, before I finish my remarks, I shall discuss whether, after all, the Congress is engaged in the discussion of much ado about little, much ado about nothing, a hysteria that has come over the country; or whether, on the other hand, we should give weight to the opinions of the Under Secretary of Commerce, of the Under Secretary of War, of the Under Secretary of the Navy, and of the man who was at the head of the War Contracts Adjustment Board, handling transactions in the renegotiation of contracts running into excess of $10,000,000,000 of recovery for the United States Government. I ask whether more credence is to be given to the observations from the Senators on this floor, with such glibness as to the hysteria, to "much ado about nothing," or "much ado about little," unaccompanied by any examination on their part as to the actual facts in the cases from the records of the courts, or whether credence should be given to those men who have studied the matter, the Business Advisory Council, for instance, of the Department of Commerce of the United States. The Department of Commerce is a governmental agency, and it is assisted by this notable Business Advisory Council.

Mr. President, I shall address myself to the amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. McGRATH]. As I see the amendment, it does five things. First, it leaves intact part I of the committee amendment, which is entitled "Findings and Policy."

Second, it contains a section the purpose of which is to eliminate existing claims.

Third, it contains a 3-year statute of limitations.

Fourth, it contains a provision for settlement of existing claims.

Fifth, it contains a section setting forth curative provisions for violations resulting from compliance with a regulation.

The McCarran-McGrath amendment goes no further.

In connection with the findings and policy portion of the committee bill, which portion, I emphasize, the McCarran-McGrath amendment does not attack, I ask unanimous consent that there be inserted in the RECORD at this point a memorandum with respect to eight decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Block v. Hirsh (256 U. S. 135 (1921)): This case dealt with the constitutionality of the 1919 Rent Control Act in the District of Columbia. At page 154 the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Holmes, made the following statement:

"No doubt it is true that a legislative declaration of facts that are material only as the ground for enacting a rule of law, for instance, that a certain use is a public one, may not be held conclusive by the courts Shoemaker v. United States (147 U. S. 282, 298); Hairston v. Danville & Western Ry. Co. (208 U. S. 598, 606); Prentis v. Atlantic Coast Line Co. (211 U. S. 210, 227); Producers Transportation Co. v. Railroad Commission (251 U. S. 228, 230). But a declaration by a legislature concerning public conditions that by necessity and duty it must know, is entitled at least to great respect. In this instance Congress stated a publicly notorious and almost world-wide fact. That the emergency declared by the statute did exist must be assumed, and the question is whether Congress was incompetent to meet it in the way in which it has been met by most of the civilized countries of the world."

Mulford v. Smith (307 U. S. 38 (1939)): This case challenged the constitutionality of the provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 relating to the tobacco-marketing provisions. At page 42 the Court set out the findings by Congress, as follows:

"Section 311 is a finding by the Congress that the marketing of tobacco is a basic industry which directly affects interstate and foreign commerce; that stable conditions in such marketing are necessary to the general welfare; that tobacco is sold on a national market, and it and its products move almost wholly in interstate and foreign commerce; that without Federal assistance the farmers are unable to bring about orderly marketing, with the consequence that abnormally excessive supplies are produced and dumped indiscriminately on the national market; that this disorderly marketing of excess supply burdens and obstructs interstate and foreign commerce, causes reduction in prices and consequent injury to commerce, creates disparity between the prices of tobacco in interstate and foreign commerce and the prices of industrial products in such commerce, and diminishes the volume of interstate commerce in industrial products; and that the establishment of quotas as provided by the act is necessary and appropriate to promote, foster, and obtain an orderly flow of tobacco in interstate and foreign commerce."

At page 47 the Court, speaking through Mr. Justice Roberts, stated:

"The statute does not purport to control production. It sets no limit upon the acreage which may be planted or produced and imposes no penalty for the planting and producing of tobacco in excess of the marketing quota. It purports to be solely a regulation of interstate commerce, which it reaches and affects at the throat where tobacco enters the stream of commerce—the marketing warehouse."

And again at page 48:

"What has been said in summarizing the provisions of the act sufficiently discloses that definite standards are laid down for the government of the Secretary, first, in fixing the quota and, second, in its allotment amongst States and farms."

Radice v. New York (264 U. S. 292 (1924)): This case challenged the constitutionality of a New York statute forbidding night employment of women. The Court stated at page 294 the rule to be as follows:

"Where the constitutional validity of a statute depends upon the existence of facts, courts must be cautious about reaching a conclusion respecting them contrary to that reached by the legislature; and if the question of what the facts establish be a fairly debatable one, it is not permissible for the judge to set up his opinion in respect of it against the opinion of the lawmaker. The State legislature here determined that night employment of the character specified was sufficiently detrimental to the health and welfare of women engaging in it to justify its suppression; and, since we are unable to say that the finding is clearly unfounded, we are precluded from reviewing the legislative determination."

Old Dearborn Co. v. Seagram Corp. (299 U. S. 183 (1936)): This case involved the constitutionality of the Federal Trade Act of Illinois. At page 195 the Court said:

"There is a great body of fact and opinion tending to show that price cutting by retail dealers is not only injurious to the good will and business of the producer and distributor of identified goods, but injurious to the general public as well. The evidence to that effect is voluminous; but it would serve no useful purpose to review the evidence or to enlarge further upon the subject. True, there is evidence, opinion, and argument to the contrary; but it does not concern us to determine where the weight lies. We need say no more than that the question may be regarded as fairly open to differences of opinion. The legislation here in question proceeds upon the former and not the latter view; and the legislative determination in that respect, in the circumstances here disclosed, is conclusive so far as this Court is concerned. Where the question of what the facts establish is a fairly debatable one, we accept and carry into effect the opinion of the legislature."

Zahn v. Bd. of Public Works (274 U. S. 325 (1926)): This case involved the validity of a zoning ordinance. The Court said at page 328:

"The common council of the city, upon these and other facts, concluded that the public welfare would be promoted by constituting the area, including the property of plaintiffs in error, a zone 'B' district; and it is impossible for us to say that their conclusion in that respect was clearly arbitrary and unreasonable. The most that can be said is that whether that determination was an unreasonable, arbitrary, or unequal exercise of power is fairly debatable. In such circumstances, the settled rule of this court is that it will not substitute its judgment for that of the legislative body charged with the primary duty and responsibility of determining the question."

To the same effect is Euclid v. Ambler Co. (272 U. S. 265).

Chesboro v. Los Angeles County Flood Control District et al. (306 U. S. 459): This case involved a petition for a mandate directing an administrative board to refrain from levying a special assessment on petitioner's property, contending that petitioner's property would not be benefited by the improvements for which the assessment was to be levied. The court said at page 463:

"In the absence of flagrant abuse or purely arbitrary action, the State, consistently with the Federal Constitution, may establish local districts to include real property that it finds will be specially benefited by drainage, flood control, or other improvements therein, and, to acquire, construct, maintain, and operate the same, may impose special tax burdens upon the lands benefited. Hagar v. Reclamation Dist. (111 U. S. 701, 704–705); Spencer v. Merchant (125 U. S. 345, 355); French v. Barber Asphalt Paving Co. (181 U. S. 324, 342). And see Houck v. Little River Drainage Dist. (239 U. S. 254, 262). And where, within the scope of its power, the legislature itself has found that the lands included in the district will be specially benefited by the improvements, prior appropriate and adequate inquiry is presumed, and the finding is conclusive."

United States v. Chandler-Dunbar Co. (229 U. S. 53 (1912)): At page 64 the court said:

"So unfettered is this control of Congress over the navigable streams of the country that its judgment as to whether a construction in or over such a river is or is not an obstacle and a hindrance to navigation, is conclusive. Such judgment and determination is the exercise of legislative power in respect of a subject wholly within its control.

"In Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge Co. (18 How. 421, 430) this court, upon the facts in evidence, held that a bridge over the Ohio River, constructed under an act of the State of Virginia, created an obstruction to navigation, and was a nuisance which should be removed. Before the decree was executed Congress declared the bridge a lawful structure and not an obstruction. This court thereupon refused to issue a mandate for carrying into effect its own decree, saying:

" 'Although it still may be an obstruction in fact, it is not so in the contemplation of law.' * * * When Congress determined, as it did by the act of March 3, 1909, that the whole river between the American bank and the international line, as well as all of the upland north of the present ship canal, throughout its entire length, was 'necessary for the purposes of navigation of said waters and the waters connected therewith,' that determination was conclusive * * * there is no room for a judicial review of the judgment of Congress that the flow of the river is not in excess of any possible need of navigation."

To the same effect is United States v. Appalachian Power Co. (311 U. S. 377, 424 (1940)).

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, it is claimed that the McCarran-McGrath amendment—at times I may, for brevity, refer to it as the "McCarran amendment"—is superior to the committee bill from a constitutional angle. The Senator from Rhode Island said this, as appears on page 2249 of the RECORD:

> I do not believe that under the Constitution of the United States the Congress has a right to declare a vested interest or property right in myself or any other American citizen to be null and void. I take it that that would be depriving me of my property without due process of law; and I cannot conceive that it will ever stand up as constitutional in the courts of the land.

Mr. President, I assume that the Senator was referring to the committee bill. Yet I observe with interest that two paragraphs further down he says:

> A substitute amendment has been offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] and myself. In that amendment we seek to handle the problem of portal-to-portal claims by taking away the statutory right that may exist or any right that may arise by statute for claims that have heretofore accrued. I do not say to the Members of the Senate that I do not entertain some slight doubt as to the constitutionality even of that approach, but at least I am going to say that if that approach is to be questioned it can be questioned on one simple point alone, which can be quickly resolved.

And so, Mr. President, as the doubt about constitutionality still resides in the mind of the Senator from Rhode Island, I am unable to see any material improvement, so far as his opinion is concerned, in the McCarran amendment over the committee amendment. As a matter of fact, the constitutional point that is presented by both the committee measure and by the McCarran amendment is identical, and if one of these proposals is invalid, the other is invalid. Both of them kill the already accrued claims. Both of them take away from persons rights which have accrued, according to the decision by the Supreme Court of the United States. If there is any deprivation of property without due process of law, the McCarran amendment is just as guilty of that deprivation as is the committee amendment.

Again, Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] was frank to say upon the floor a day or so ago that he could see—I think he said—"no difference," possibly "little, if any, difference," between the two measures as to existing claims. It is only as to the existing claims that any constitutional question can be presented. Likewise, the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] was equally frank to say, in substance, as I recall, that he could see no difference between the two measures so far as the existing claims are concerned. Even the senior Senator from Kentucky this afternoon conceded in his response to the junior Senator from Kentucky that in his opinion there was no difference.

Then the senior Senator from Rhode Island, with a very interesting but, to my mind, very difficult-of-comprehension argument, immediately persuaded the senior Senator from Kentucky that there was a material and vast difference between the two proposals.

As a matter of fact, Mr. President, these two measures are almost identical in language, certainly in content, with respect to the constitutional question that is presented; and I may say, with, I trust, a somewhat just pride, that the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from Rhode Island have done our subcommittee and the Committee on the Judiciary the compliment to adopt substantially the language we have prepared or caused to be prepared in the committee amendment, so far as existing claims are concerned.

Now, Mr. President, as a matter of fact, as indicated, I think, very clearly in this argument on more than one occasion, the constitutional basis of both these measures is sound under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States; for when Congress has power over any field of endeavor, as, for illustration, interstate commerce, to legislate, any person who makes a contract with respect to that subject matter does so subject to the right of Congress to invalidate and set aside not only future contracts but existing and past contracts. So I undertake to say that this alleged improvement of the McCarran amendment over the committee amendment, from a constitutional angle, does not exist. Both of them are valid from a constitutional standpoint, notwithstanding the doubt of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. MCGRATH] of the constitutionality of the measure which he himself advocates, which doubt he admits in the RECORD of this Congress.

Mr. President, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], who this afternoon has expressed himself on the matter—and, by the way, he had not spoken only this once upon the bill; I do not recall how long he spoke the other day, but he expressed himself distinctly at page 2295: The Senator from Wyoming is impressed by the fact that, to quote his comments, "inequities will be imposed by the committee bill upon those who are employed."

Mr. President, I again call attention to the fact that the same identical inequities will be imposed by the McCarran amendment, for there is no substantial difference between the McCarran amendment and the committee bill with respect to the killing of the claims which now exist.

We are told, Mr. President, to quote again from the language of the Senator from Rhode Island, at page 2249, that the committee bill is a misfit and he also cites the fact as he says, that the committee bill is erroneous in including the Walsh-Healey Act and the Bacon-Davis Act within its scope. The expression of alarm with respect to the inclusion of these two acts which has been vividly and dramatically voiced this afternoon by the distinguished senior Senator from Kentucky, I undertake to say, Mr. President, is not justified by the facts. I shall demonstrate in a few moments why it is that the Congress should not adopt an act of this type, without the inclusion of the Walsh-Healey and the Bacon-Davis Acts within its scope.

Notwithstanding the compliment which the Senator from Rhode Island has paid to the bill, over which our subcommittee and the Committee on the Judiciary have worked, certainly conscientiously if not skilfully—notwithstanding the statement of the Senator from Wyoming that the committee bill is a misfit, I respectfully call attention to the fact that his co-author of the amendment now before us [Mr. MCCARRAN], at page 2245 of the RECORD, says that the committee bill—and I quote him—"evidences, throughout its text, the work of highly trained, extremely capable and extremely legalistic lawyers."

Mr. President, it may be that the word "legalistic" is not intended as complimentary, but certainly words "the work of highly trained, extremely capable" indicate that at least to the mind of the Senator from Nevada work of some character has been done upon this measure. I deem to be somewhat in conflict with this compliment paid by the coauthor of the pending amendment the declaration of his colleague from Wyoming that the bill which has been produced after a period of weeks, beginning with the institution of hearings, ending only after nine distinct drafts had been prepared, is a misfit.

Indeed, Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Nevada goes further in his comment upon the bill, at page 2245, and declares:

> The language of the Senate committee amendment is, in fact, so meticulously drawn that I am confident that many of the things which would be accomplished by it were not comprehended by all members of the Committee on the Judiciary, and were not intended by all the members of that committee who voted for the majority bill.

Mr. President, I have confidence in the ability of the members of the Judiciary Committee of the United States Senate. I undertake to say that when a lawyer of the distinction and standing of the former chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary refers to this measure as being meticulously drawn, it is hardly in accord with and hardly comports with that statement to declare that as a result of the meticulous drawing of the instrument, by men whose work evidences the fact that "they are highly trained and extremely capable," to quote his language, I say it is somewhat at variance to say that, after all, the members of the Committee on the Judiciary cannot understand it.

Mr. President, I want to call attention to one very interesting fact which illustrates what to my mind is so clear that no eye should fail to see it, no ear should fail to hear it; that is that the McCarran amendment was hastily drawn and was not given the thought, by any manner of means, which was given to the committee amendment. Indeed, Mr. President, while I do not have a record of the exact date on which the distinguished Senator from Nevada presented to the committee his first draft of the bill, it was very close to the time when the Committee on the Judiciary was concluding its deliberations. The fact I was going to call to the attention of the Senate as indicative of the haste with which this measure was drawn, is this: It will be recalled that all these Senators have leveled criticism at our inclusion in the committee bill of the Walsh-Healey and

Bacon-Davis Acts; yet, it will be noted that the McCarran-McGrath amendment leaves in the bill, in full force and effect, these significant words of the findings and policy made by our committee, which are found on page 10 of the bill:

The Congress further finds and declares that all of the results which have arisen or may arise under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, as aforesaid, may (except as to liability for attorney's fees and, in the case of the Bacon-Davis Act, for liquidated damages) arise with respect to the Walsh-Healey and Bacon-Davis Acts and that it is, therefore, in the national public interest and for the general welfare, essential to national defense, and necessary to aid, protect, and foster commerce, that said Walsh-Healey Act and said Bacon-Davis Act be amended, as hereinafter set forth.

Mr. President, one of two things is true: Either that the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from Rhode Island failed to observe, due to the haste with which their amendment was prepared, the fact that they had left in the bill the language which I have read or else they did not dare to move upon the floor of the Senate to strike out language of such significance and importance as that with which our findings and policy are concluded.

Mr. President, I may say also that the McCarran-McGrath amendment, which is now before the Senate, was never presented to the Committee on the Judiciary. We had the benefit, as I have stated—and as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] has stated—of quite material suggestions of importance and interest by the Senator from Rhode Island. I would not say that the Senator from Nevada did not give some suggestions, but I will say that because of his absence from the city for a week or so, and because of the fact that he was not on the subcommittee, I presume we did not have the benefit, as my colleague from Kentucky has stated, of his suggestions and assistance, which would have been very helpful doubtless, and which we should have very greatly welcomed, until very near the conclusion of our deliberations and work. The amendment which was finally presented to the Committee on the Judiciary in the private office of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], the chairman of that committee, by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] and Mr. Sourwine, former counsel for the committee, is not the amendment which is now before the Senate. The amendment which was then presented did go into the future; it did not stop with the past, but went into the future and undertook to legislate to give the Wage and Hour Administrator the right to make rules and regulations and prescribed the standards which he should follow.

Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from Rhode Island as a contrast to the bill prepared by the committee after hard work and diligent effort should not receive the favorable consideration of the Senate. It has been contended here most eloquently that the committee bill—and I quote again from the Senator from Nevada:

Thoroughly emasculates the Fair Labor Standards Act.

And a statement by the Secretary of Labor was produced, excerpts from which read:

As a matter of fact, the language and phraseology of H. R. 2157 are open to a construction that would vitally affect the future enforcement of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

I call attention to the fact that that is a very guarded statement. There is no statement there that the language and phraseology of the committee bill are such as to constitute a vital effect upon the enforcement of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

They are open, says the Secretary—

To a construction that would vitally affect the future enforcement of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Then, proceeds the Secretary:

Under some of the terms of the bill, the millions of workers who are unorganized and without the benefit of union protection would be deprived in the future of many of the protective provisions of the present Fair Labor Standards Act.

Mr. President, I should like to call attention to the fact that under date of January 15 there was sent to the Secretary of Labor by myself a letter, which I ask to have incorporated at this point in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JANUARY 15, 1947.

SECRETARY OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C.:

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: On January 10, 1947, there was appointed by Senator WILEY, of Wisconsin, chairman of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, a subcommittee the members of which, who were so appointed by him, being Senator COOPER of Kentucky, Senator EASTLAND of Mississippi and myself.

Senator WILEY is ex officio a member of said subcommittee. I was designated as chairman of the subcommittee. Attached is copy of statement made to the Senate on January 13, 1947, by myself.

The subcommittee would be pleased to have a representative of your office appear before it. Please see that the office of the Committee on the Judiciary is notified as to whether or not such representative will appear. If such representative will appear, the office of said committee will be pleased to arrange a time at which the appearance shall occur.

Yours very truly.

Mr. DONNELL. The concluding paragraph of the letter reads:

The subcommittee would be pleased to have a representative of your office appear before it. Please see that the office of the Committee on the Judiciary is notified as to whether or not such representative will appear. If such representative will appear, the office of said committee will be pleased to arrange a time at which the appearance shall occur.

I call attention, also, Mr. President, to the fact that 2 days later, namely, January 17, a similar letter went to Mr. L. Metcalfe Walling, Administrator of the Wage and Hour and Public Contracts Division, which, as I understand, is within the Department of Labor. I may say that the Secretary of Labor did not appear before our committee. Mr. Walling did appear. I made inquiry this morning of the Undersecretary of Labor, former Governor Keen Johnson, of Kentucky, a friend of mine whom I have known for some years, and he informed me that Judge Schwellenbach, the Secretary of Labor, immediately upon receipt of my letter, directed Mr. Walling to appear before our subcommittee.

Mr. President, I do not criticize the Secretary of Labor. I realize fully that he doubtless thought that Mr. Walling, being in charge of this work, was the man most qualified to come before the subcommittee, and I do not in any sense criticize Judge Schwellenbach. But the fact is that here on yesterday comes forth a criticism of the bill, a criticism emanating, so it appears, from the Secretary of Labor, who did not come before the subcommittee and did not send anyone from his office, other than the man to whom a separate invitation or letter had gone forward, as I have indicated, namely, Mr. Walling.

Mr. President, now although the distinguished Senator from Nevada imputes this evil result to the legislation, namely, that it emasculates the Fair Labor Standards Act, yet I observe with very much interest and appreciation that at page 2244 of the RECORD he absolves completely the members of the Committee on the Judiciary and of the subcommittee, I believe, and all Members of the Senate, from any such evil intention. The Senator said:

Let me make it clear, Mr. President, that I do not now charge—

I do not know whether he intends to do so in the future, but he has not so far—

Let me make it clear, Mr. President, that I do not now charge that the majority has an intention to repeal or emasculate the Fair Labor Standards Act, or that the Judiciary Committee of the Senate has any such intention, or that any particular Member of the Senate has any such intention. What I do say is that this committee bill, now before us, will accomplish that result; and if the bill is passed, by the votes of the majority, the majority will have to take the responsibility.

Mr. President, I may say two things: I am pleased to observe that the Senator has absolved us from the evil intent of emasculating the Fair Labor Standards Act, though it is somewhat incongruous that after having admitted, as he has, the careful training and obvious ability of those who drew the bill, he now charges that inadvertently, and without realizing what they were doing, they had so seriously injured and wounded and maimed the Fair Labor Standards Act as to emasculate all the beneficial features of that act.

Mr. President, what are the facts?

Mr. MCCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I will yield for a moment. It is only 30 or 31 minutes until 3 o'clock, and I have declined to yield to other Senators.

Mr. MCCARRAN. Very well, if the Senator has heretofore declined to yield I shall not urge him to yield. I have a telegram here the context of which I wanted to get into the RECORD.

Mr. DONNELL. Is it extensive?

Mr. MCCARRAN. No; it is only a few lines.

Mr. DONNELL. Would the Senator be kind enough to place it in the RECORD later? I should like to continue with my remarks, if the Senator please.

Mr. McCARRAN. The telegram bears on what the Senator was saying, but I shall defer.

Mr. DONNELL. Very well.

Mr. President, what are the facts with respect to these measures? As I have indicated first, as to past claims, those as to which this constitutional objection may be made and at which it will be leveled, both the committee bill and the McCarran-McGrath amendment do the same thing. Both of them provide in substance that no activities at any time during the day, from one end of the day to the other, the whole 24-hour period, shall be compensable unless by express provision of a contract or by custom or practice not inconsistent with such contract.

Mr. President, if one of these measures emasculates the Fair Labor Standards Act as to the past, the other does so to the identical extent. The two proposals vary quite decidedly with respect to the provision authorizing settlement of claims. Our bill does not provide for the possibility of making settlements unless section 2 of the bill shall be declared invalid. That is the section which deals with past claims and undertakes to kill the portal-to-portal suits. As I say, our bill does not provide for the possibility of making settlements unless that section is declared invalid. On the other hand, the McCarran amendment permits immediate settlements prior to action by the courts, which would make it possible for contractors and other employers to make settlements and then shift to the United States Government the ultimate burden of such settlements in the event cost-plus contracts were involved in the case of war contractors, and to the extent of recoverable taxes in the case of any company or manufacturer which might have to pay any of such claims, or should pay them, and then be entitled to recover taxes from the Government. So if the McCarran plan of authorizing settlements now should be adopted, in my judgment, it would mean in many instances that the taxpayer would ultimately pay the bill for the settlement of such claims which might be made between the employer and the employee.

I take it that it is advisable, as is provided in our bill, not to open a field day for settlement, in which employers can afford to be liberal with employees and perhaps obtain new labor contracts, as perhaps the Dow Chemical Co. did. It paid out $4,500,000 and obtained a new labor contract. I do not know whether there was any connection between the two events or not. The employer would be able to negotiate a new contract without the prospective advance in wages which had been previously planned. The result would be that the taxpayer would pay for the settlement to the extent of recovered taxes, which I understand, in the case of the Dow Chemical Co., represents 57 or 58 cents on each dollar of settlement.

As I have indicated, the McCarran amendment does not deal with future claims. Our bill does. Our bill goes into the future; and in a very few minutes I shall discuss what the committee bill does as to the future, and why it does it.

First let me invite the attention of the Senate to the fact which was mentioned by my colleague on the subcommittee [Mr. COOPER] a few minutes ago. The McCarran provision contains language with respect to what is called curative provisions for violations resulting from compliance with regulations. It is to the effect that if an employer can satisfactorily show by competent evidence that his failure to pay minimum wages or overtime compensation under the act was occasioned by his adherence, prior to the time of the publication of a succeeding written interpretation or regulation, to a written interpretation or regulation of the Administrator, he shall not be liable for the claim. As the Senator from Kentucky pointed out, this provision means—and I want labor to understand this—that if the employer can show satisfactorily by competent evidence, whatever those words mean—that his action was occasioned by adherence to a regulation in writing of the Administrator, he escapes not only liquidated damages, double damages, but also liability for payment of the difference between the amount which he paid and the minimum required by statute.

Let me illustrate. Under the McCarran amendment if the employer had relied on the ruling of the Administrator that he, the employer, was not under the Fair Labor Standards Act, and thereafter paid his employees only 25 cents an hour and worked them 50 hours a week, the employer would not subsequently have to pay them the Fair Labor Standards Act minimum of 40 cents and overtime for time in excess of 40 hours a week.

I say that this provision in the McCarran amendment is a bad mutilation of the Fair Labor Standards Act. What does our bill do? Our bill merely provides that if an employer acts in good faith on a written regulation or ruling of the Administrator, he shall not be liable either for a criminal penalty or for the payment of liquidated damages, which are double the amount required by the statute to be paid in the event of violation. As the Senator from Kentucky has so clearly pointed out this afternoon, this provision in the McCarran bill is a strong, vigorous attack upon the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act. It would enable an employer, if he could prove satisfactorily by competent evidence that he had relief upon such a ruling, to escape not merely liability for liquidated damages, not merely the liability of going to jail or paying a fine, but also payment of the difference between the wages which he paid and the minimum required under the act. As I have stated, as to past claims our bill would have the same results as would the McCarran amendment.

As to the future, I point out the fact that our bill leaves untouched the workday proper, or what I may roughly term the time between whistle time in the morning and whistle time in the afternoon. During that period any rights of labor under the Fair Labor Standards Act remain unaffected. Using the same illustration which I used the other day, considering the quadrilateral formed by the speaker's stand before me as the workday, that is not affected by our bill. We seek to legislate only with respect to activities preceding the workday and following the workday.

This provision of our bill was due in large part—I think I may say almost entirely—to the point which was made in my office by Mr. Cotton, the assistant counsel of the CIO, and Mrs. Peterson, of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers organization. They pointed out that if as to the future we undertook to legislate and wipe out the compensation for iniquitous practices of an employer, we would be doing tremendous damage to labor. To illustrate, if we had made our bill applicable in the future to a situation in which a woman sat in a production line waiting for 2 hours while materials did not come, and under the custom of the employer and under his contract no compensation was to be paid the employee, if we were to legislate in such a way that she could not recover compensation for that time without a contract or custom, we would be perpetuating and making valid by law an iniquitous practic which in our judgment it is not proper to perpetuate or make valid.

So we changed our plan. Because of the representations made to us on behalf of labor, our bill, as to the future, seeks to legislate only with respect to preliminary and postliminary activities, such as walking to the actual place of work, and also activities preliminary to or postliminary to the principal activity or activities of the employee. It is in this field—notably with respect to preliminary activities—that the decision in the Mount Clemens case has caused a deluge of unexpected litigation. With respect to those items, that is to say, the preliminary activities and the postliminary activities, before the begining of the workday and after the end of the workday, we submit that there is no injustice in saying that before a person shall be entitled to recover compensation for such preliminary or postliminary activities he must show that he is entitled thereto either by contract or by custom or practice not inconsistent with the contract.

Mr. President, there are in the committee bill several exceedingly important provisions which the McCarran amendment does not contain. In the first place, in section 4 of our bill, we included a provision to cover the contingency in the earlier portion of section 2, the portion under which the existing claims for portal-to-portal suits are killed. In that portion of our bill known as section 4 we have put in a provision, with certain alternative provisions, which would apply only in case the earlier portion should not be sustained as valid.

I undertake to say, Mr. President, that there is no confession in the slightest degree of the unconstitutionality of our measure. As I have indicated, both the McCarran amendment and the committee amendment are, according to the language of the Supreme Court of the United States, in my judgment, constitutional. The fact is that there undoubtedly is the probability, if not the certainty, of litigation with respect to this measure, and it is only the better part of judgment to provide that in the event the courts should hold the measure to be unconstitutional, should sustain, for illustration, the position of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. McGRATH], who regards our bill as unconstitutional and his own as being of doubtful constitutionality—I say it is only the better part of wisdom to incorporate provisions which will say, in effect, that if we cannot kill the portal-to-portal suits we shall at least do as much as is within our power toward removing the unjust advantages which the holders of those claims possess under the statute. The McCarran amendment does not contain such a provision. Our bill does. For that reason, as well as for other reasons, I think our bill is preferable.

With respect to limitations, our bill contains a 2-year limitation. The McCarran amendment contains a 3-year limitation. I expressed the view in the earlier discussion of this matter that the question of whether the limitation shall be 2 years or 3 years is one upon which there may be a just difference of opinion, but I call attention to the fact that last year, in Report No. 1395, which was submitted to the Senate by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] from the Committee on the Judiciary with respect to bill H. R. 2788, the distinguished Senator from Nevada himself advocated the adoption of the measure which in that case required that all causes of action accruing after the enactment of the law be limited to 2 years. In other words, on May 29, 1946, the Senator from Nevada, who now argues so strenuously in favor of a 3-year limitation, advocated a 2-year limitation, which is contained in the bill reported by the committee.

I call attention also to the fact that although the distinguished Senator now criticizes the use of the words "good faith" without definition in our bill, in the report which he filed on May 29, 1946, he approved legislation which would provide protection "to all persons who have in good faith relied upon any regulation, order, or administrative practice."

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I shall vote for the bill as represented by the committee amendment, without further amendment, first, because I believe, with my distinguished colleague, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL], that the bill has been carefully drawn and will prevent obvious abuses; second, that it does lay the foundation for collective bargaining upon the points at issue.

I agree with Mr. Justice Burton in his dissenting opinion, in which he said:

> The amounts at issue * * * might not average as much as 5 to 10 minutes a day a person and would not apply at all to many of the employees. None of this time would have been spent at productive work. The futility of requiring an employer to record these minutes and the unfairness of penalizing him for failure to do a futile thing by imposing arbitrary allowances for "overtime" and liquidated damages is apparent.
> While conditions vary widely and there may be cases where time records of "preliminary activities" or "walking time" may be appropriate, yet here we have a case where the obvious, long-established and simple way to compensate an employee for such activities is to recognize those activities in the rate of pay for the particular job. These items are appropriate for consideration in collective bargaining. * * *
> In interpreting "workweek" as applied to the industries of America, it is important to consider the term as applicable not merely to large and organized industries where activities may be formalized and easily measured on a split-second basis; the term must be applied equally to the hundreds of thousands of small businesses and small plants employing less than 200 and often less than 50 workers, where the recording of occasional minutes of preliminary activities and walking time would be highly impractical and the penalties of liquidated damages for a neglect to do so would be unreasonable. Such a universal requirement of recording would lead to innumerable unnecessary minor controversies between employers and employees. "Workweek" is a simple term used by Congress in accordance with the common understanding of it. For this Court to include in it items that have been customarily and generally absorbed in the rate of pay but excluded from measured working time is not justified in the absence of affirmative legislative action.

Mr. President, to claim back pay for time expended not previously considered compensable by either employee or employer is so patently not in the public interest as almost to preclude serious discussion.

In our western metal mines we know little of portal-to-portal pay or discussions. We do, however, understand the collar-to-collar shift. I have worked in such mines, and so far as I am concerned, when one steps into an ore bucket and disappears underground, he is at work.

This bill, in my judgment, covers the points at issue. First, it precludes any claims not contemplated by either employee or employer when the contract for employment is consummated.

Second, it leaves all such matters, including the collar-to-collar shift and rates of pay, to future collective bargaining, as suggested by Mr. Justice Burton in his dissenting opinion, to which I unqualifiedly subscribe.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] made the statement that, in his judgment, this bill would not benefit small business a penny's worth, or some such expression. The distinguished former chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary subscribed last year to a 2-year statute of limitations—the same as our bill provides—and at that time he said that bill would be particularly beneficial to small employers.

As has been frequently said, the McCarran amendment does not contain any provision as to future claims. Why is it advisable to legislate as to future claims? I take it, Mr. President, that the answer is clear and conclusive.

I call attention to the fact that in the report submitted by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] to accompany House bill 2788, the Senator from Nevada subscribed to the following doctrine in referring to a measure which provided a 2-year statute of limitations and extended protection to all persons who had in good faith relied upon any regulation or order or administrative ruling, and so forth:

> This legislation will be particularly beneficial to small employers. They generally do not have the large legal staff necessary to keep them posted daily on the volume of administrative regulations, rulings, and interpretations issued by Government bureaus. These regulations are the law under which the employer is expected to operate—

And so forth. So, Mr. President, although yesterday in a somewhat offhand statement one Senator—I believe it was the Senator from Wyoming—stated that, in his judgment, this bill would not benefit small employers a nickel's worth or a penny's worth—or the Senator used some similar expression—yet last year the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] advocated the enactment of a bill providing a 2-year statute of limitations, as does our bill, and in that respect the Senator from Nevada said:

> This legislation will be particularly beneficial to small employers.

Mr. President, there should be certainty, as nearly as possible, as to what preliminary activities are compensable. The best way to arrive at certainty is by contract or custom, rather than to allow future unexpected and surprising liability to be corrected as it was in the Mount Clemens case "regardless of custom or contract."

Some may say that that case has exhausted all the realm of human probabilities in connection with portal-to-portal activities. I see across the aisle the distinguished Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH] who brought to the subcommittee a witness from the potash industry. He called attention to the fact that in that industry in New Mexico, suits embracing millions of dollars have been filed; and one point involved in the case was that 70 minutes each day is required in riding back and forth to and from the potash mine, and that therefore the persons who ride are entitled to time and a half multiplied by two, for the time consumed in riding.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. DONNELL. I yield for 2 minutes.

Mr. HATCH. I merely wish to tell the Senator from Missouri, if he does not already know it, that the travel-time claim about which he has been speaking has been eliminated by the Federal district judge in New Mexico.

Mr. DONNELL. I thank the Senator for that information. I was not aware of it. However, the ruling to which I had referred is so obviously ridiculous and beyond reason that it seemed incomprehensible that it should have remained in effect.

Mr. President, it is only common sense to put down in black and white in this measure the requirements which a person must observe. It is only common sense to require that before he is entitled to obtain recovery he shall be required to show a contract or a custom under which he is entitled to the recovery he seeks.

My time is almost at an end, but I wish to pay brief attention to the Bacon-Davis Act and the Walsh-Healey Act. The McCarran-McGrath amendment does not include reference to the Bacon-Davis Act or the Walsh-Healey Act, although, as I have stated, and I now repeat for the benefit of Senators who have since entered the Chamber, the drafters of the McCarran-McGrath substitute perhaps unwittingly omitted including the provision of our bill which states:

It is, therefore, in the national public interest and for the general welfare, essential to national defense, and necessary to aid, protect, and foster commerce, that said Walsh-Healey Act and said Bacon-Davis Act be amended, as hereinafter set forth.

Mr. President, those two acts should be included. In the first place, it is true, of course, that few suits, if any, have been filed hitherto under the Bacon-Davis act or the Walsh-Healey Act. The reason is clear. It is that under those acts all a man can recover is the amount of wages to which he is entitled. Under those acts no one is entitled to recover liquidated damages equal to the amount of wages to which he was entitled. However, Mr. President, two facts should be noted. In the first place, great difficulties may develop for employers in the future, under the Fair Labor Standards Act, because in the case of war contracts, there is great doubt whether suits, even though nominal, against employers are in fact against the Government, and obviously under the Fair Labor Standards Act a suit cannot, by the express provisions of that act, be maintained against the Government.

Furthermore, it may well be held that suits may not be filed and successfully maintained by employees who were working on war contracts, because interstate commerce might not be involved in such suits. There is now in existence a subcommittee of this body which has been looking into the fact that at one time the Attorney General directed that these two defenses—namely, the absence of the interstate commerce element and the fact that the Government is the real party in interest—be made. We find this interesting testimony by Mr. McGregor in the course of the hearings:

Now, the Department has, itself, defended a number of cases. I pointed out several here, defended on the grounds that employees whose activities related solely to new and original construction were not engaged in commerce or production of goods for commerce.

Senator MOORE. Will you repeat that, please?

Mr. MCGREGOR. I say, the Department has been successful in defending a number of cases on the ground that the employees whose activities related solely to new and original construction were not engaged in commerce and the production of goods for commerce.

In a number of other cases the Department has sustained the burden of proving that the plaintiffs were employed in a bona fide executive, administrative, or professional capacity within the meaning of the exemptions established by section 12 (a).

Mr. President, suppose the Congress enacts the pending bill but does not include its references to the Walsh-Healey and Bacon-Davis Acts. Then a man who files suit under the Fair Labor Standards Act will find such suit canceled and nullified by the action of Congress. What will he do then? If he is an employee working in a plant which makes any material for the benefit of the Government, and which comes under the Walsh-Healey Act, he will join with other employees in requesting—yes, demanding—of the Secretary of Labor that a suit be filed for his protection under the Walsh-Healey Act because he has lost his protection under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Mr. President, to abandon the protection of the Walsh-Healey Act and the Bacon-Davis Act would be the part of absolute mistake, and would be the poorest sort of judgment. Why did the House of Representatives include it? I understand that some jurisdictional point was involved. I do not know the full details regarding it, but I undertake to say that, whether wittingly or unwittingly, they placed in the bill a wholesale protection for the Government of the United States which we would be foolish indeed to leave out of our bill.

Mr. President, I wish to say that we approach this problem with a materially different point of view from that of the Senator from Rhode Island. As I have indicated, yesterday he said that this is "much ado about nothing" or "much ado about little." The Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] yesterday rather eloquently proclaimed, in substance, that this is a large hullabaloo—I have forgotten the exact words he used, and I do not have before me at the moment a notation of what they were.

We find it to be true, of course, as appears in this morning's newspapers, that one suit has been dismissed. But that is only one suit out of 1,915. It was dismissed yesterday or the day before. That was a suit against the Westinghouse Co., and was in the amount of approximately $2,000,000. I hold in my hand a telegram which I have received from Fort Smith, Ark., from the Athletic Mining & Smelting Co., Raymond F. Orr, president. It reads as follows:

On March 11, 1947, suit was filed against our company in Joplin, Mo., by "individuals, members, and officials of International Union of Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers, CIO, as agents and representatives of certain employees of defendant and for and in behalf of all employees similarly situated." Total amount claimed in this portal suit asking damages since 1938 is $600,000, plus attorneys' fees and interest. Our company has operated a zinc smelter at Fort Smith, Ark., since 1917. Our net worth or working capital, comprising all quick assets less current liabilities, is $289,000. This suit just filed is for twice our net worth and could mean bankruptcy to us and loss of jobs and wages to workers. We and others desperately need protection against such legalized hijacking.

ATHLETIC MINING & SMELTING CO.,
RAYMOND F. ORR, President.

Mr. President, I shall conclude my remarks with this one statement: Here we have on the one hand Senators who tell us that this is "much ado about nothing" or "much ado about little," and they pooh-pooh the seriousness of the situation; and, on the other hand, we have the Department of Commerce, the Under Secretary of War, the Under Secretary of the Navy, a representative of the Maritime Commission, and other important officials who take a contrary view. Which shall we take?

We are not here legislating against labor. We have given every possible consideration, I think, that it is reasonable to request to the representatives of labor. We have been materially piloted and charted in our method of drafting the bill by the representatives of labor. We are here, as are all Senators, not for labor as a class or for management as a class; but we are legislating for the public of the United States of America.

Mr. President, I ask that the McCarran-McGrath amendment be rejected, and that the committee amendment be adopted.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I have necessarily been absent from the Senate during the time this question has been under debate. I have prepared a short statement which gives my position on it. I ask unanimous consent that the statement may be placed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY HUGH BUTLER (REPUBLICAN), OF NEBRASKA, REGARDING H. R. 2157, PORTAL-TO-PORTAL BILL, MARCH 21, 1947

Mr. President, a few days ago when S. 70 the Senate Judiciary Committee's portal-to-portal bill was on the calendar, I had printed an amendment to be proposed on the floor. This amendment was a simple one. It contained virtually the same language found in section (2) (e) of H. R. 2157, which is now before us, in the form in which it was passed by the House of Representatives last week by the overwhelming vote of 345 to 56. I had changed the language of that bill only slightly, to make it applicable particularly to the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 because S. 70 purported to deal only with that act.

My amendment was intended to accomplish only a purpose which the Senate and House of Representatives both approved last year, the purpose of removing danger of suits from employers who acted in good faith under an administrative regulation which later was found invalid by the Supreme Court (case of Addison v. Holly Hill Fruit Products, decided June 5, 1944). Last year both the Senate and the House passed H. R. 2788, but in slightly different language. Final passage of the legislation in the House failed only because of the last-minute drive for adjournment. The House again has overwhelmingly approved such legislation, and I proposed that it be incorporated in S. 70, both because it is appropriate in this bill and because of the delay that might occur if we did not consider it at that time.

Because of my long experience in the grain business and my intimate contact with country grain elevators, I know the threat that exists for many of the men in that business unless Congress acts to take away an unjust threat. Since 1938 they have relied upon the definitions issued, as provided by law, by the Administrator of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, on the area of production. Under the Administrator's definition these employers in country grain elevators were assured that their employees were exempt from the minimum wage and maximum hours sections of the act if they were doing the work specified for that exemption. Many, if not all, of these employers were paying over the minimum wage, but due to the peculiar demands upon a country elevator by its farmer customers, employers were not required to consider overtime.

The Administrator had made his definition of area of production partly upon the basis of the number of persons employed in an establishment, and it was this restriction as to number of employees which the Supreme Court in 1944 held invalid. The Court ordered that a new definition be prepared by the Administrator, and that this new definition be retroactive in effect. The Administrator did not issue his new definition until December 24, 1946, and that definition placed under coverage of the act many employees whom the Administrator's previous rulings had held to be exempt.

So here is the simple situation: An employer in a country elevator who gave full faith to the earlier definitions of the Administrator of an agency set up by Congress, now finds himself in jeopardy of suits for overtime back pay as far back as the statute of limitations will allow. If this situation is allowed to stand, some of these operators of these small country business units could be threatened literally with financial ruin through suits for back overtime pay. Even the Administrator of the act admits the unfairness of this situation. I estimate that approximately 700 of these country elevators have been thrown back under the act by the Administrator's latest definition, and that these affected operators are rather evenly scattered throughout the surplus grain-producing areas. The definition now is based in large part upon the population of a town where the elevator is located, and this is a restriction not covered by previous regulations.

Essentially, all that my amendment tried to accomplish was to provide that if an employer relied on a ruling or interpretation of the Administrator, he would be protected and any change in ruling or definition would not operate retroactively. I was afraid that if this amendment were not adopted, it might be some time before we could give the legislative relief which these people need.

Since my amendment was prepared the whole situation has changed. The bill which had been reported by the Senate Judiciary Committee was withdrawn for further study by the committee, and the House bill (H. R. 2157) was reported with an amendment which gave effect to part of what I had in mind. Then my colleague the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] proposed and secured adoption of an amendment which removed the threat of punishment or suits for liquidated damages against employers acting in good faith. The principal difference between the Senate and House versions of the bill now appears to be that the Senate bill would still permit suits for recovery of wages against such employers while the House bill bars such suits entirely. I am not informed whether an additional amendment will be presented in the Senate to give employers the same protection they receive under terms of the House bill. Speaking for myself, I believe the House version is preferable, and I hope it may be adopted in conference. On that basis, I will not press for further consideration of my proposal at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 3 o'clock having arrived, all debate is concluded.

Mr. DONNELL. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of a quorum is suggested, and the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Byrd	Ecton
Baldwin	Cain	Ellender
Ball	Capper	Ferguson
Barkley	Chavez	Flanders
Brewster	Connally	Fulbright
Bricker	Cooper	George

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] on behalf of himself and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. MCGRATH].

Mr. DONNELL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MCCARRAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. MCGRATH] and I desire to perfect our amendment by striking out in line 5, page 3, the word "three" and inserting the word "two."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be perfected as indicated.

The question now is upon the amendment submitted by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. MCGRATH] as perfected. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed beginning in line 19, on page 10, to strike out all down to and including line 2, on page 23, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

PART II

EXISTING CLAIMS ELIMINATED

SEC. 201. The second sentence of subsection 16 (b) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended to read as follows: "Action to recover such liability may be maintained in any court of competent jurisdiction by any one or more employees for and in behalf of himself or themselves and other employees similarly situated; such action shall be deemed to have been commenced as to any individual claimant as of the date when such claimant is named in such action as a party thereto; and no employee shall be made or deemed a party plaintiff to any such action until his consent in writing to become such a party is filed in the court in which such action is brought: Provided, That no employee shall have any statutory right of recovery under this act based on any claim for unpaid minimum wages or unpaid overtime compensation or liquidated damages to the extent that such claim involves such activities of an employee engaged in prior to the effective date of this proviso as were not compensable working time under either (1) an express provision of a written or nonwritten contract in effect, at the time of such activity, between such employee, his agent, or collective-bargaining representative and his employer or (2) a custom or practice not inconsistent with any such contract in effect at the time of such activity at the establishment or other workplace where such activities were performed."

SEC. 202. Section 16 of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended by adding at the end thereof three new subsections, as follows:

"STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS

"(c) No action under this act for unpaid minimum wages, or unpaid overtime compensation, or liquidated damages, shall be brought or maintained unless commenced within 2 years after the cause of action accrued or, if such cause of action accrued prior to the date of enactment of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947 and such action is brought before the expiration of the period of 180 calendar days next following such date, then within the period of any applicable State statute of limitation: Provided, That this section shall not be construed to revive or extend any action which otherwise would have been barred by any statute of limitation applicable to such action.

"SETTLEMENT OF CLAIMS

"(d) Settlement, compromise, release, or satisfaction of any claim under this act, for unpaid minimum wages, unpaid overtime compensation, or liquidated damages, accrued before the date of enactment of this subsection shall be a defense thereto and any other appropriate legal or equitable defense may be pleaded in defense of such claim.

"CURATIVE PROVISIONS FOR VIOLATION RESULTING FROM COMPLIANCE WITH A REGULATION

"(e) In any judgment hereafter rendered by any court of competent jurisdiction involving a claim under this act, accrued prior to the date of enactment of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947, for unpaid minimum wages, unpaid overtime compensation, or liquidated damages, the employer shall not be held liable for such claim if he can satisfactorily show by competent evidence that his failure to pay minimum wages and overtime compensation under this act was occasioned by his adherence (prior to the time of the publication of a succeeding written interpretation or regulation) to a written interpretation or regulation of the Administrator, even though such interpretation or regulation so adhered to was determined by judicial authority to be invalid."

SHORT TITLE

SEC. 203. This act may be cited as the "Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947."

Amend the title so as to read: "An act to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]. On this vote I transfer that pair to the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON], and will vote. I vote "nay." If the Senator from New York were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. RUSSELL (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CORDON]. If the Senator from Oregon were present he would vote "nay." If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WHERRY. I announce that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON] is absent because of illness. He is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]. If present and voting the Senator from Wyoming would vote "nay," and the Senator from New York would vote "yea."

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] is absent by leave of the Senate. He is paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. If present and voting the Senator from Indiana would vote "nay," and the Senator from Maryland would vote "yea."

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. CORDON] is absent by leave of the Senate. He is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL]. If present and voting the Senator from Oregon would vote "nay," and the Senator from Georgia would vote "yea."

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BUSHFIELD] is unavoidably detained.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] are necessarily absent.

On this vote the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] is paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART]. If present and voting, the Senator from Maryland would vote "yea," and the Senator from Indiana would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 53, as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. MCCARRAN and Mr. MCGRATH was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Swanson, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 27) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to the terms of office of the President.

EXEMPTION OF EMPLOYERS FROM LIABILITY FOR PORTAL-TO-PORTAL WAGES IN CERTAIN CASES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2157) to define and limit the jurisdiction of the courts to regulate actions arising under certain laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair, the unanimous-consent request now requires a vote on the committee amendment as amended, without further debate of any nature.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HOLLAND. Does the unanimous consent permit the offering of an amendment to the committee substitute, without debate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is entitled to send his amendment to the desk, to be stated by the clerk, but there can be no debate, and there must be an immediate vote upon the amendment.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. O'CONOR] and myself, I desire to send to the desk an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the amendment.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Amend the bill so as to strike out all provisions contained therein relating to the Walsh-Healey Act and the Bacon-Davis Act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida, for himself and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. O'CONOR].

Mr. HOLLAND. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. AIKEN and Mr. BALDWIN voted in the negative when their names were called.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LUCAS. Am I correct in understanding that the amendment we are now voting on eliminates all provisions with respect to the Walsh-Healey Act and the Bacon-Davis Act?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the opinion of the Chair, but the Chair thinks the clerk had better state the amendment again, so the Senate may judge for itself.

The Chief Clerk again read the amendment, as follows:

Amend the bill so as to strike out all provisions contained therein relating to the Walsh-Healey Act and the Bacon-Davis Act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will continue the roll call.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I would like to propound a parliamentary inquiry to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator may do so.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is based upon the Chair's announcement a moment ago that his interpretation of the agreement entered into yesterday precluded any debate on the committee substitute. That was not my understanding, otherwise there would have been no point in fixing 5 o'clock as the time at which there should be a vote on the final passage of the bill. I have no desire to debate it, but I am rather impressed by the fact that it was the general understanding here that after a vote on the substitute offered by the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from Rhode Island, there would be a period extending up to 5 o'clock, during which there could be discussion of the bill itself, and that then the vote would come, not later than 5 o'clock, on final passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, as the Chair understands it, there is an opportunity from 3 o'clock to 5 to discuss the bill as it will finally pend for passage. Clearly, under the unanimous-consent agreement, however, at not later than the hour of 3 o'clock, the Senate must proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment or motion that may be pending or that may be proposed to the committee substitute, and upon the committee substitute for the pending bill, H. R. 2157. The Chair can find no latitude under which he can agree with the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. In the negotiations that led to the final agreement, I think it was the general understanding—it certainly was mine—that between the vote on the amendment we have just voted upon and final passage, there would be opportunity to discuss the provisions of the committee bill, or the final passage of the bill, up to 5 o'clock. I am not interested in discussing it further, but if the Chair's announcement means there can be no debate from now until 5 on the bill as it will be finally voted upon, it certainly was not my understanding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not what the Chair stated. The Chair stated that from 3 to 5 the bill as it will finally pend for a vote will be open for debate, but at the present time there is no further debate possible upon the substitute or the committee amendment as amended; and the Chair will have to add to the able Senator from Kentucky that even the parliamentary inquiry is out of order, inasmuch as two Senators have answered to the roll call.

Mr. BARKLEY. I thought I addressed the Chair before the first Senator answered; I did not intend to interrupt the roll call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair, the Senator spoke after there had been responses to the roll call. The clerk will continue the roll call.

The legislative clerk resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]. On this vote I transfer that pair to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] and will vote. I vote "nay." I wish to add that if the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] were present he would vote "yea" on this question.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WHERRY. I announce that the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CORDON] and the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] are absent by leave of the Senate. If present and voting the Senator from Indiana would vote "nay."

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON] is absent because of illness.

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BUSHFIELD] is unavoidably detained.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] are necessarily absent.

The result was announced—yeas 39, nays 50, as follows:

So Mr. HOLLAND'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the bill, as amended, which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 15, line 4, after the words "or activities", it is proposed to insert "unless said activities are normally engaged in during the working day."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HATCH. I think the Chair has already answered the inquiry I am about to make, but I am frank to confess that I am confused about the unanimous-consent agreement entered into on yesterday and its present interpretation by the Chair. I will say that I have read the agreeement and I think the Chair's interpretation is correct. If I am advised correctly, the Chair has held that no debate will be permissible upon any amendment whatever between 3 and 5 o'clock. Is that correct?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct. In the Chair's opinion the unanimous-consent agreement requires continuous voting to the conclusion of the consideration of the committee amendment, as amended, whereupon the only question pending before the Senate from that time until not later than 5 o'clock will be the question on the third reading and final passage of the bill.

Mr. HATCH. Continuing my inquiry then, merely to point out the vice of such agreements; all that is necessary to do to shut off debate between 3 and 5 o'clock would be to offer an amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No debate on an amendment would be in order between 3 and 5. An amendment could not be received after the committee amendment as amended has been agreed to.

Mr. HATCH. The Senator from West Virginia has just offered an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. After the committee amendment, as amended, is agreed to, the bill is pending on its third reading and final passage.

Mr. HATCH. Yes; but I think the Chair misunderstood me. I said any Senator can offer an amendment to the committee amendment, just as the Senator from West Virginia has done, and that automatically cuts off debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Until the committee amendment as amended is voted upon, the Senator is correct.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE].

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the demand sufficiently seconded?

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I request that the amendment be again stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At the request of the Senator, if there be no objection, the pending amendment will be again stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 15, at the end of line 4, following the words "or activities," it is proposed to insert "unless said activities are normally engaged in during the working day."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE].

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], and vote "nay." The Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] is absent by leave of the Senate. If present and voting would vote "nay," and the Senator from New York would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WHERRY. I announce that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON] is absent because of illness and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CORDON] is absent by leave of the Senate. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BUSHFIELD] is unavoidably detained.

Mr. LUCAS. I announce that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] are necessarily absent.

So Mr. KILGORE'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have it stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Washington will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 18, after line 22, it is proposed to strike out down to and including line 16, on page 19.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON].

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. PEPPER. In view of the fact the amendment refers only to pages and lines, can the Chair tell me what the effect of the amendment will be?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is unable to state because the Chair has no further advice with reference thereto than has the Senator from Florida.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, a further parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. PEPPER. Is it true that the amendment would strike out the 2-year statute of limitations and leave the statutes of limitations to the several States?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is unable to answer that question.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, is it permissible for the clerk to read the portion of the bill proposed to be stricken, in order that Senators may know on what they are voting?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that that is an appropriate request, and if there be no objection the clerk will read the language which the pending amendment seeks to strike. The language which the clerk is about to read is the language which would be stricken out by the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 18, after line 22, it is proposed to strike out the following:

SEC. 9. Limitations: (a) The Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, is further amended by adding at the end of section 16 the following new subsection:

"(c) (1) Every claim under this act for unpaid minimum wages, unpaid overtime compensation, or an additional amount as liquidated damages, accruing prior to or on or after the date of enactment of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947, shall be forever barred unless, within 2 years after such claim accrued, suit to enforce such claim is commenced in a court of competent jurisdiction.

"(2) Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (1) of this subsection, suit to enforce any such claim accruing prior to the date of enactment of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947 may be commenced within 120 days after such date if such claim is not barred at the time of commencing suit by any other statute of limitations; and the period of limitation provided for in paragraph (1) of this subsection shall not be applicable to any suit so commenced."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] would strike out the language which the clerk has just read.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] and vote "nay". The Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] is absent by leave of the Senate. If present and voting would vote "nay", and the Senator from New York would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WHERRY. I announce that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON] is absent because of illness and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CORDON] is absent by leave of the Senate.

Mr. LUCAS. I announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] are necessarily absent.

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 61, as follows:

YEAS—28

Barkley	Langer	O'Conor
Chavez	Lucas	O'Mahoney
Downey	McCarran	Pepper
Green	McFarland	Stewart
Hatch	McGrath	Taylor

So Mr. MAGNUSON'S amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment for which I ask immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the bill it is proposed to insert the following new section:

SEC. —. Section 6 (a) (4) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, is amended by striking out "40 cents an hour" and inserting in lieu thereof "60 cents an hour."

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I move to lay on the table the amendment which has just been offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate on the amendment is not in order. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio that the amendment be laid on the table.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. STEWART. In view of the unanimous-consent agreement to vote on amendments, is the motion of the Senator from Ohio in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such a motion is always in order; but the net result is the same.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, for the purpose of the RECORD, will the President pro tempore direct the clerk to read the names of the sponsors of the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will read the names of the sponsors.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is submitted by Mr MYERS, Mr. MAGNUSON, Mr. MCMAHON, Mr. PEPPER, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. CHAVEZ, and Mr. TAYLOR.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, the name of the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON] was inadvertently omitted from the list of sponsors of the amendment. I ask that it be added.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The name of the Senator from South Carolina will be added.

The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MORSE. Is the motion to lay the amendment on the table debatable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Ohio to lay on the table the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania for himself and other Senators.

Mr. LANGER and other Senators asked for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President——

The yeas and nays were ordered; the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll; and Mr. AIKEN voted in the negative when his name was called.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Mexico was on his feet and addressing the Chair when the yeas and nays were ordered and the call of the roll was commenced; so he is recognized at this point.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon asked whether the motion to lay on the table was debatable. Now I ask whether the amendment itself was debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was not. The clerk will resume the calling of the roll.

Mr. MCMAHON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MCMAHON. A vote "yea" on this motion is a vote against a 60-cent minimum, is it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A vote "yea" is a vote to lay on the table the amendment submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS].

The clerk will resume the calling of the roll.

The legislative clerk resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], and will vote. I vote "yea."

The Senator from Indiana is absent by leave of the Senate. If present and voting, the Senator from Indiana would vote "yea," and the Senator from New York, if present, would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WHERRY. I announce that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON] is absent because of illness; and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CORDON] is absent by leave of the Senate.

Mr. LUCAS. I announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] are necessarily absent.

The result was announced—yeas 57, nays 32, as follows:

So the motion to lay Mr. MYERS' amendment on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question occurs on agreeing to the amendment of the committee, as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, with respect to the amendment which was just offered regarding the rate of minimum wage, I was unable before the amendment was voted on, to make the statement I wished to make because of the limitation on debate.

I desire to say that that matter is pending before the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, together with some 8 or 10 other amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act, involving the various exemptions which are now in effect under that act. Our committee proposes to take up the matter. Certainly by my motion to lay on the table I did not intend to indicate necessarily opposition to the raising of the minimum wage. Last year I voted to raise it from 40 cents to 60 cents. That question cannot be considered except in relation to the various exemptions now contained in the act, and the effect on the different industries concerned. I can only say that our committee will take the matter up at the earliest possible moment, and give full consideration to amendments to the basic provisons of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

My only reason for making the motion was that the amendment was not properly related to the matter now before the Senate; that it happened to involve the same question which is pending before our committee, and because the matter has not as yet had the consideration it should have before the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. I should like to inquire whether or not the amendment had at any time been presented in the committee considering the pending legislation.

Mr. TAFT. I am not on the Committee on the Judiciary, so I cannot say. There is a bill pending in the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare to raise the minimum wage to 75 cents, as I recall the figure. I am not certain about the amount.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. I should like to say, in reply to the Senator from Maine, that it was not considered as a part of the pending bill in the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. PEPPER. Will the able Senator from Ohio inform the Senate whether or not his Committee on Labor and Public Welfare has had any opportunity whatever to consider the pending legislation, notwithstanding the fact that it vitally affects the Wages and Hours Act, the jurisdiction of which falls under the Senator's committee?

Mr. TAFT. Our committee has not considered the question of portal-to-portal pay. At the beginning of the session the pending bill was referred to our committee, I think, when the question of jurisdiction between the two committees was raised, and as we had the general problem of labor legislation in our committee which we wished to begin to consider at once, I made no objection to the reference of the matter to the Committee on the Judiciary, which considered it last year. It seemed to involve more constitutional questions than direct questions relating to the act itself, and I still think that is the fact.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. In regard to the question asked by the Senator from Maine and answered by the Senator from Michigan, as to whether the amendment just voted on was offered in the committee, I wish to say that I know of no rule or practice or theory which bars any Senator from offering an amendment to any bill, whether it was ever offered in committee or not. If there were any such practice, no one but a member of a committee could ever offer an amendment to a bill on the floor of the Senate, if it was not offered in the committee itself.

Mr. TAFT. The Senator will recognize, however, that from time immemorial, since amendments have been offered on the floor which have not been offered in committee, they have always been open to that objection.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think it is a captious objection, no matter who makes it.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield further?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. In reply to the Senator from Kentucky let me say that an amendment of this character, which was certainly of very serious import, which was considered and voted on here a year ago in this Chamber, had apparently not been considered as germane or of importance to the pending legislation so that any Member of the Senate or anybody else had availed himself of his undoubted opportunity to offer the amendment in the committee. I do not understand the statement of the Senator from Kentucky that only a member of the committee could offer it, because certainly at the hearings on the pending legislation any Member of the Senate or any citizen of the United States had full opportunity to go before the committee and offer or suggest an amendment and have it considered.

I may remind the Senator from Kentucky that debate on the pending measure has been proceeding for 5 or 6 days, and there has been most ample opportunity for the offering of amendments of any character designed to improve the bill, but the amendment was not offered. However, after the unanimous-consent agreement, which afforded opportunity for the ceremonies in which the Senate has been indulging for the last hour, this amendment was thrust in. I will leave it to every individual to determine what was the purpose and what was the motive and what was the idea. I make no implications.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I merely wish to state, in further reference to the remark I made awhile ago answering the question propounded by the Senator from Maine, that it carried with it an implication that Members of the Senate who are not members of the committee, and therefore could not have offered any amendment in the committee, should not, by some interpretation or practice, or theory, be allowed to offer amendments on the floor. They could not offer them in the committee, and furthermore, the fact that the amendment was offered only now is no indication that the Senator from Pennsylvania or any other Senator might not have tried to get recognition earlier to offer it.

The offering of amendments depends upon the parliamentary status of a bill and the amendments which are pending, and it is no reflection upon a Senator that he exercises his right to offer an amendment after other amendments have been disposed of or after an agreement has been made to limit debate or to vote at a certain hour. The fact that the legislation was voted on in the Senate during the last Congress it seems to me offers no legitimate reason why the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania was not appropriate to be offered. The Senate had disposed of it, but certainly he was not violating any propriety or any rule or any theory with which I am familiar in offering it at this time.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BREWSTER. I did not intend to intimate any impropriety or any violation of parliamentary procedure. I merely intended to indicate that if the matter was so important as apparently it was thought to be, it was strange that in all the time that passed in the committee consideration and in the discussions on the floor the amendment was not earlier brought to our attention.

I still do not understand the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky that any Senator or any citizen cannot offer an amendment in a committee considering a bill. I have been sitting on committees for some time, and my experience is much more limited than that of the Senator from Kentucky, but I think we have scarcely ever had a bill before a committee in which I have been sitting, where Senators and others have not come forward to offer amendments.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield again to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not want to prolong the discussion, but I did not intend to indicate that any Senator could not offer an amendment at any time, either in committee or on the Senate floor. What I suggested was that at any time during the consideration of a bill before the final vote any Senator, regardless of whether he was a member of the committee reporting the bill and regardless of whether the amendment was offered in the committee could offer it from the floor.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, it had never occurred to me that I should ask unanimous consent to explain my amendment. Of course, if Senators on the other side of the aisle want to take up the time by explaining their votes, and giving the reasons for their votes, that is perfectly satisfactory; but there is nothing mysterious about this amendment. At the last session we passed a bill increasing the minimum wage, and I see no reason why there should be considerable debate over such a proposal when it is offered to the pending measure. There is nothing at all that needs to be explained. The amendment merely proposes to increase the minimum wage from 40 cents to 60 cents. If Senators on the other side wish to explain their votes, I am sure we will be very happy to hear their explanations, but I hope the Senator from Maine will not question my motives in submitting such an amendment. I did not think it needed to be submitted at any other time, because I failed to see that it needed any amplification.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I only rose to explain that this matter should have further consideration by the committee. When we voted to adopt it last year, we did so in connection with eight other amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act, which were closely related to it. It seems to me that it should be so considered, and such consideration will be given by the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. I yield the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I wish to make a very brief remark in regard to the motion to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS]. I voted for the motion to lay on the table because of the Chair's ruling; and the Chair rightly so ruled. The motion to lay on the table was not debatable, but, even without such a motion the unanimous-consent agreement under which we are laboring and are handicapped, made it impossible to debate the amendment after 3 o'clock. Yet, certainly, if there is any subject that ought to be debated at some length in the Senate of the United States it is the proposal of a minimum wage.

Second, I voted as I did because, in my judgment, the Senator from Pennsylvania proposed an amendment most inadequate, to provide a fair and just minimum wage rate for the underprivileged workers of America. I am surprised that the Senator from Pennsylvania would offer an amendment calling for a minimum wage of 60 cents when the cost of living is such as it is in the United States today. If he had suggested 75 cents, and we could have had a little debate on it, then I think I might have been able to join forces with the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield?

Mr. MORSE. I will yield in a moment. But certainly, Mr. President, I could not go along with my good friend from Pennsylvania on a minimum wage proposal of 60 cents.

My last point, Mr. President, is that I think the procedure this afternoon has demonstrated once again how wise the junior Senator from Oregon usually is in his objections to unanimous-consent agreements, and, as fast as I can, I am going to restore myself to that position of wisdom when it comes to future unanimous-consent requests. When the request was made yesterday we went along with it, but the spirit and the intent of the request, at least as I understood it, was that today, after 3 o'clock, when we voted on the amendments to the McCarran substitute and the substitute itself, we would then have an opportunity to debate amendments to what we considered to be the bill proper. Because of the wording of the agreement, the Chair, I think, had no other course but to hand down the ruling that he did; but on several amendments offered this afternoon I think there would have been a different vote had we had an opportunity to discuss them. As an example I suggest the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE]. I doubt if there are very many Members of the Senate who really understand the effect of that amendment, or understand that apparently the amendment would not have had a destructive effect on the main objective of the bill as proposed by the Subcommittee on the Judiciary. I think it would have clarified some legal points which ought to have been clarified before the bill was finally passed.

So I say, Mr. President, because of the proposal for an amendment to the Fair Labor Standards Act fixing a minimum wage of 60 cents involved a figure entirely too low, and because of the fact that we were laboring under the handicap of an unfortunate unanimous-consent agreement, I voted as I did. Now I am glad to yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MYERS. There is much merit to the explanation by the Senator from Oregon. Unfortunately, though, too many Senators agreed with the Senator from Oregon, and so the minimum wage provision of the law remains at 40 cents instead of 60 cents. It would have been much better if the Senator from Oregon had offered an amendment to my amendment to increase it from 60 to 65 or 75 cents—whatever amount he might have in mind. But it occurs to me that we would be much better off with a minimum wage of 60 cents than with a minimum wage of 40 cents, although I am in complete accord with the Senator from Oregon that it should be more than 60 cents. At the same time I remembered that last year when we debated the Fair Labor Standards Act at some length the best we could get was approximately 60 cents; therefore I was hopeful at least we could take that one step forward, rather than to make no progress because of trying to get too much at one time.

Mr. MORSE. I am very glad to have the Senator's statement of assurance that he will go along with us on a high rate of wage, once we can get the bill before the Senate on its merits.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. McMAHON. I suggest that the Senator from Oregon address his prayer for future action to increase the minimum wage not only to the Senator from Pennsylvania but particularly to the side of the aisle on which he stands. In that event, I think the prayer might have, shall I say, better application.

Mr. MORSE. I never pray for this side of the aisle.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WHERRY. What is the pending question before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was about to state that the question is on the engrossment of the amendment and the third reading of the bill.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Chair.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been read three times, the question is, Shall it pass?

Mr. LANGER and other Senators asked for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, is it in order to make a few remarks on the bill at this time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is in order for that purpose until 5 o'clock.

Mr. TAYLOR. That will afford plenty of time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair's statement was not an invitation, but a notification. [Laughter.]

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, the Republican majority in this House, of course, have the power to turn the clock back, and repeal all social advances made in the Roosevelt period. But I think they should have the courage to be honest about it—to present to this House a bill to repeal this legislation instead of achieving the same effect by devious methods. A great hue and cry has been raised about portal-to-portal pay suits. But behind this barrage of propaganda an attack is being made, not merely upon portal suits, but upon the Fair Labor Standards Act itself.

For example, section 3 provides that no action may be maintained "based upon failure of an employer to pay an employee for activities heretofore or hereafter engaged in by such employee other than those activities which at the time of such failure were required to be paid for either by custom or practice of such employer or by express agreement at the time." This section does not amend or modify the wage and overtime provisions of the Wages and Hours Act. It repeals them. Under the bill, if an employee sued for failure to pay for overtime activities the employer's answer could be simply that, "It is not my practice to pay for such activities." In other words, if charged with violating the law, his defense could be, "I have always violated the law. Why, I have been violating it ever since the day it was passed."

In order to eliminate the portal-to-portal suits which have aroused so much indignation it would have been sufficient to provide that an employer would be protected in every case where he had an agreement expressly covering these overtime activities with the duly designated collective-bargaining agent of his employees. But this measure goes further. In effect, it says the employer can do as he pleases. If a union thinks this practice of an employer is unfair or in violation of the standards set out in the Fair Labor Standards Act, they cannot, under the bill, go peacefully to the courts for redress. They can seek redress, under the bill, only by resorting to their economic strength, by strikes, and by picket lines. For custom has become higher than law. And this is the proposal of those who presumably are looking for a solution to industrial disputes.

And, so far as the unorganized workers whom this same group so piously proclaims it wishes to protect from the power of unions are concerned, these unorganized workers will be left with no recourse. They will be exactly where they were before the passage of the Fair Labor Standards Act—they will have to take what the employer is willing to give them. They will be forced to organize and protect their rights.

Mr. President, we must be open about this. If we want to bar portal suits, let us do that. And if anyone wants to abolish the protection of the Fair Labor Standards Act and return to an age of unrestricted exploitation of human labor, let him say so openly.

I am particularly annoyed by the section of the bill which outlaws existing portal-to-portal claims. This section involves a decision by Congress to intervene in law suits now in court and to decide them by legislation in favor of one party. I believe this is clearly unconstitutional. At the very least it will invite years of court interpretation before liabilities may be determined with any certainty.

I believe that most of the cases that are now pending would be disposed of under the de minimis doctrine applied by Judge Picard in the Mount Clemens case. In other words, the millions of dollars in portal claims that we hear about is a completely meaningless figure. Plaintiffs always ask for enormous amounts in their complaints. I am confident that not 1 percent of the amount now asked for in the cases taken as an aggregate could possibly be granted by courts or juries. Most of the complaints seem doomed to dismissal. Under the circumstances then there seems to be no justification for a sweeping and unconstitutional revision of law which will strike at the heart of the Wages and Hours Act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the final passage of the bill, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hawkes	Murray
Baldwin	Hayden	Myers
Ball	Hickenlooper	O'Conor
Barkley	Hill	O'Daniel
Brewster	Hoey	O'Mahoney

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Ninety Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The question is on the final passage of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, I have listened to the debate concerning this bill, and as I listened I could not help asking myself, "Where is labor going to end? What are we going to do with labor in the United States?" As I see it, this measure only opens the door to taking away from labor everything that it has gained during the past 14 years. I believe that the majority of the members of this body, particularly the lawyers, will acknowledge that so far as two acts are concerned, they should not be included in the pending bill.

I am mindful of the fact that in 1933 the majority of textile workers in the South were receiving less than 30 cents an hour. If we break down the protection which they have, I do not say that they will go back to 30 cents an hour, but I fear that they will certainly lose much that they have gained during the past 14 years.

Let us look at the bill for a few minutes and see if we are being fair with the workingman. If my memory serves me correctly, each year we pay back, or anticipate paying back, approximately $2,000,000,000 in income-tax refunds. It would be just as fair to enact a bill prohibiting the payment of income-tax refunds as it would be to enact the bill which is now before the Senate.

Why do I say that? We are taking away from the employee a right which he has at present, and we acknowledge it. Otherwise such a bill would not have been introduced. We are not willing to leave the question to our courts to decide. I am not in favor of introducing a bill every time we check up on big business and find conditions which ought not to exist. Before long we shall have an extended debate on a measure known as the Bulwinkle bill, which is nothing more than an effort to take from the courts the authority to penalize the railroads if they violate the antitrust laws. In this instance there are workers who have rights, and by this bill we would take away those rights.

This is called a portal-to-portal bill. The name is a misnomer. If it dealt only with what took place during the actual working time, it would be one thing. But it does not stop there.

Take the example of a mechanic in a cotton mill. I worked in one for 11 years. Let me tell the Senate some of the things of which we are proposing to deprive workingmen. Certain men in the mill known as section men in the spinning room or loom fixers in the weave-shop must report 15 minutes ahead of time. Some mills pay them for that time and some do not. Obviously we are going to compel manufacturers who have paid for such time to continue to do so. The ones which have not been doing so will not pay for it.

If this measure had been in effect, some of the cases which I have brought into court would probably have been thrown out. In the cases which I carried to court the employees should have received compensation, and they did receive such compensation in every case which I filed.

Let me cite one example. I have in mind the case of a paymaster and timekeeper in a cotton mill. During the working hours on 5 days it was necessary for him to check the activities of employees in various rooms, because different kinds of records were kept. Some worked by the hour. Some worked by the day. Some worked at piece-work. Some worked by pick, and some by hand. It was his duty to see that the records were kept straight. He had to do that work during the working hours on 5 days. Year in and year out that man went into the mill office on Saturday morning and worked for 3 or 4 or 5 hours to make up the pay roll for the following week. He was not paid anything for that time. Would he be paid under the terms of this bill? He did not ask for pay for that time until he lost his job.

Anyone who works in an unorganized mill—and approximately 80 percent of them in my State are unorganized—has a tendency to fear to bring suit while he is working for the meal ticket which he draws from week to week for the support of his wife and children. He does not want to lose his job. This man worked not for 1 year or 2 years, but for more than 3 years, and then was discharged. He came to me, and collected in court. Is that unjust? Do we want to penalize workers in such cases?

But this bill does not stop there. We must not take away these rights of the laboring people. This bill is only the beginning. There will be others introduced, probably under misleading names. This is called a portal-to-portal pay bill. That is not an accurate description of what it deals with, when we consider it from beginning to end and see how many things have been injected into it.

I am glad to say that in checking up the vote it is found without exception that the votes on this side of the aisle have been in favor of every amendment which has sought to make the bill more liberal, whereas on the other side of the aisle only three votes have been cast in favor of any amendment. There have been five roll calls. The majority party in this body has the power and has shown by its votes today what it will do to labor in the United States. That is the record which Senators will see tomorrow when they receive the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I will say to the Senator from North Dakota that I have checked up with him and find that without exception he voted for every amendment offered.

Mr. LANGER. I know the Senator would not want to make a misstatement. As to one amendment there were five Republicans who voted for it.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. There have been only 15 such votes in all, across the aisle, on 5 roll calls. That shows the thinking which is going on across the aisle, even though the Senator from North Dakota voted for each amendment.

Mr. President, I should like to remind the Senate of an aspect of the portal-to-portal bill which we tend to overlook in debate—that is, the need for the wage-hour legislation and its beneficial effects. We must take every care to protect its basic standards against encroachment.

I have too intimate a knowledge of the effects of wage-hour legislation in my own State during periods when the cotton-textile industry was depressed, to risk weakening its effectiveness during a possible future period of depressed prices, limited demand for cotton, and an oversupply of labor. We need to maintain the future usefulness of this legislation intact.

We do not have to be reminded of the low wages, the long hours, and the employment of child labor that prevailed in many industries before the passage of the Fair Labor Standards Act. They affected not only the workers who worked long hours for low pay, but they imperiled the higher standards that some workers had won or that some employers had voluntarily granted.

Let us consider, for example, the cotton-textile industry. In 1939 more than one-half of the manufacturing wage earners in South Carolina were employed in making broad woven cotton goods, and many others were in related industries—making cotton yarn, and dyeing and finishing textiles. This is a manufacturing industry in which labor costs represent a relatively high percentage of the value of the product. It would therefore be sensitive to any adverse effects that might be caused by the imposition of increases in wage rates. For this reason, it is especially illuminating to trace the results of minimum-wage laws in the industry.

In July 1933, before the National Recovery Administration, all but a small proportion of workers in the cotton goods industry in the South averaged less than 30 cents an hour. In August 1933, after the National Industrial Recovery Act was passed, less than one-tenth of these workers received so little; and in August 1934, a year later, the proportion receiving under 30 cents an hour had been reduced still further, to less than 7 percent.

In April 1937, some time after the invalidation of the NRA by the Supreme Court, almost one-sixth of the wage-earners in the cotton-goods industry in the South averaged less than 30 cents an hour. In August 1938, a year later, the proportion had risen to nearly one-fourth.

It is not necessary to be an alarmist to find in these figures a warning against tampering with our basic minimum wage legislation.

Under the Fair Labor Standards Act, the 25-cent minimum rate became effective in October 1938. The minimum rate for cotton textiles was raised to 32½ cents an hour on October 24, 1939, by industry committee action; and to 37½ cents by the same method on June 30, 1941. Industry committee action, as Senators know, was concentrated in those early days on industries where relatively large numbers of employees would presumably be affected by wage orders.

During this period when wages were being raised by Federal action, cotton mill employment, as well as pay rolls, increased, contrary to the dire predictions of opponents of the legislation. Mill margins—the difference between the cost of raw cotton and the selling price of cloth, a test of profitability in the industry—also increased.

Since that period the demands of war production and the impact of generally rising wage and price levels have caused textile wages to rise far beyond the required statutory minimum of 40 cents an hour. The minimum rate is now generally 65 cents an hour, and higher minimum rates are in effect, or are being negotiated, in a number of plants. While employment in cotton manufactures rose about one-sixth above the 1939 average, pay rolls nearly trebled.

Average annual wages and per capita income in the South, though still below the national average are beginning to approach it. Average annual wages and salaries of southern manufacturing employees who are covered by employment compensation laws had risen to about three-quarters of the national average in 1944. In South Carolina per capita income payments rose from a little over one-third of the national average in 1929 to about one-half in 1940, and to 58 percent in 1945.

Although this is far from a perfect record, I submit that it shows marked progress; progress along a path that I think we should continue to follow. I think it will be agreed that the basic protections of the act—the minimum wage, the overtime, and the child-labor provisions—are too important to be tampered with lightly.

Senators will surely agree that we must take every precaution in order not to risk any weakening of the basic supports for our wage-hour structure. We shall need every prop we have contrived—and probably additional ones—if we should encounter a future period of recession, with its concomitant slackened demand for goods and for labor. We shall then need the strongest possible supports to prevent wage levels from tumbling disastrously. We must continue to be assured these minimum guarantees against unfair competition, so that the progressive employer who maintains decent working conditions will not be submerged by unscrupulous competitors whose advantage is based on low wages and substandard labor practices. The fundamental benefits of the act must be preserved, and its aim of setting fair labor standards must be kept clearly in view.

The provisions of the Committee bill which we are considering would in large measure negate the purpose and the benefits of the Fair Labor Standards Act in the future. One of the most important means of obtaining the compliance of employers in meeting the basic requirements of the act on a voluntary basis lies in section 16 (b), which provides, at the same time, a protection to workers who are illegally deprived of their rights under the law. Senators are familiar with the terms of this section, which permit a worker to bring suit for back wages due because he has not been paid the minimum wage or because he has not been paid for overtime at the rate of time and a half for all hours over 40 a week, and to receive as liquidated damages an amount equal to his wrongfully withheld earnings. Although substantial sums have been regained by workers through the exercise of their rights under this provision, they are of minor importance compared with its indirect influence on employers.

Let me elaborate on this point. I need not remind Senators that the Congress has never considered it necessary to provide funds sufficient to allow for annual inspections of each employer subject to the act. In other words, enforcement of the act by inspection, and the consequent administrative measures, such as injunctions against further violations, or fines and imprisonment for willful violators, has not been considered practical, and the means to achieve it have not been considered necessary. The law itself does not rely very heavily upon such measures since it does not directly authorize the Administrator to bring suit for back wages, and limits the penalties through such court action as the Administrator can bring in the case of willful violations.

In view of this fact, the right given to employees to collect wages that should have been paid to them and the damages due them because such wages were withheld is thus of double importance. It constitutes at one and the same time an essential protection to employees which would otherwise be lacking, and an incentive to employers to meet the requirements of the act lest they be forced later to pay a double amount. Without this provision, there would be little pressure upon an employer who wanted to violate the act, to save money at his employee's expense, not to do so. If the most that could happen to him was that he would later have to pay back wages in accordance with the act, he would have nothing to lose by failing to pay at the time and taking a chance on having to pay later. In any situation in which he was not certain of his obligations, it would be to his advantage to decide the issue in his own favor, against his employees, secure in the knowledge that if he was wrong he had nothing to lose.

The liability of employers in suits brought by their employees has thus been a powerful factor in obtaining voluntary compliance with the act. It is unlikely that we could point with pride to the relatively high degree of compliance that has existed if it were not for that liability, since legislative history has demonstrated time and again that no regulatory statute can be effective unless it includes some penalties for failure to observe its requirements. Now let us consider how the committee bill will affect this provision of the act. Section 9 of the bill establishes a 2-year limitation on all claims brought under the act, whether for back wages or for liquidated damages. Any wages which an employee does not claim within 2 years after the time when they were due him are lost to him for good.

It may seem at first glance, Mr. President, that this is fair enough, since indefinite liability or liability which varies according to the laws of the various States, is certainly neither equitable nor desirable. However, if we look into the circumstances under which employees bring claims, it is immediately clear that the fairness of the 2-year period is apparent rather than real. Before employees can make their claims obviously, they must first be aware that they have not been paid what is justly and legally due them; and, perhaps less obviously but nonetheless truly, they must also be free to make claim against their employers.

As to the first factor, many employees are not familiar with the scope and requirements of the law, and may not know of their rights under it even when they are aware that they are not being paid in accordance with its provisions. This is particularly true of employees who do not belong to unions, and therefore have no outside source of information. These employees are in large measure dependent upon the Wage and Hour Division to inform them of their rights, when inspection of the employer's books shows that he has not been conforming to the act. But months may elapse, Mr. President, between the time a violation is discovered and the time the employee can make his claim. Inspections take several weeks, in some cases months; formal notice must be sent to the employee; and the employer must get legal advice and arrange to have his claim filed in court. Six or 8 months or more may have passed, if the employer delays the course of the inspection, or the employee has left his job and cannot be readily located. During this time, the employee's rights will be expiring, and with a 2-year limit he may find he can claim only a fraction of the money which is due him, since nearly half of the time was gone before he could file the claim.

The second factor I mentioned is also of great importance in delaying employees' claims. Experience has shown—and I know this from my own experience, as well as from other sources—that employees seldom bring claims against employers by whom they are still employed, because of the fear of losing their jobs. It is reasonable and understandable for a worker to put continued employment before claims for unpaid wages, since the former is certainly more valuable to him. But his rights under the act should not be subject to barter in return for security in his job, and a situation in which this is possible destroys his employer's incentive to pay him in accordance with the act, since he can materially, if not entirely, reduce his liabilities for not doing so.

I am speaking, Mr. President, not from hearsay, not from theory, but from my own experience. I have handled hundreds of claims brought by employees for wages due them under the Fair Labor Standards Act, brought against employers—individuals and corporations—who had failed to meet the requirements of the act. In practically every case, the employees had let the claims run a year or more before bringing suit. I do not believe we should penalize the large number of workers who cannot bring suit, or who do not dare to bring suit, until some such time has passed by adopting a 2-year limitation. I believe a fairer period would be the 3-year limitation voted by this body last summer.

I should like to discuss also, Mr. President, another section of the committee bill which will, it seems to me, have a damaging effect upon employees' benefits and protection under the Fair Labor Standards Act. Section 10 of the bill would prohibit any claims for liquidated damages under the act if the employer was "in good faith" replying on, or acting in accordance with, "any regulation, order, interpretation, ruling, or practice of the Administrator." At first glance this section, too, seems to be fair and equitable, assuring protection to employers who are trying to comply with the act from having to pay damages. But some of the language which has been used would, I believe, make the section susceptible of very broad interpretation, and of application which was not intended.

"In good faith" is a very general phrase which would be difficult to disprove in the absence of flagrant violations. In combination with the equally broad phrasing of "every interpretation, ruling, or practice," it could conceivably be applied to provide immunity to employers in many situations in which it is not deserved. Would it, for example, apply to an employer following practices of another employer who has been inspected by the Wage and Hour Division, or who alleges that he has the approval of the Wage and Hour Division? Such an employer could, it seems to me, maintain that he was, in good faith, relying on a practice of the Administrator, although I do not believe that immunity for such employers is intended or should be provided.

A provision such as this should be carefully worded, Mr. President, with every precaution taken to limit it to those situations in which the employer has honestly been complying with the law to the best of his knowledge. It should not provide a possible escape to employers who have been "getting away with" violations—particularly since it destroys some of the employees' rights under the law. I believe this section should be modified, limiting an employer's immunity to actions which were in compliance with orders of the Administrator which were clearly applicable to him. If he had acted in compliance with the Administrator's written regulations, or with written rulings which applied specifically to him or to his industry and which were issued with the full knowledge that if they were followed by the employer he would be protected from claims for damages, I would have much greater faith that this section would accomplish its purpose.

Because of the serious threat which this committee bill brings to the future effectiveness of the Fair Labor Standards Act, whose objectives I firmly believe in, I believe we cannot adopt the recommendations of the committee. In their present form they constitute a threat to the continued maintenance of the standards which are still an essential safeguard to millions of workers in this country, to whom the act provides basic protection in their working relationships. This protection may be needed even more urgently in the years to come.

Mr. President, this bill will do great damage to the laborers of this Nation if it is enacted into law. There is not pending at the present time in my State any portal-to-portal suit. No such suits have been filed in South Carolina, so that this bill, if enacted, would not affect us. But it will affect labor in the future.

Probably some compromises are in progress in South Carolina. This bill, if enacted, will stop them. The only question which the Senate has before it is whether or not it shall pass the bill as amended. I, for one, will not lend my vote to the enactment of the bill.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I do not believe that any Member of the Senate has been more disturbed in connection with voting on this proposed legislation than I have been. I have been very uncertain in my mind how to vote when the final vote comes. I believe that labor was extremely unwise in starting the portal-to-portal suits, which amount, in the aggregate, to several billions of dollars. I have no sympathy for those who started court suits to embarrass employers, to achieve a bargaining point, or to get billions of dollars which they never expected to get in the first place.

When I think of that situation, I think that I shall vote for the bill. When I think of the numberless employees who belong to no union whatsoever and who have perhaps fifty or one hundred dollars due them in back pay, and then think that by voting for the bill I might vote to deprive them of the only opportunity they have to collect the money which is due them and which means so much to them, I realize that I cannot vote for such legislation.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AIKEN. I should like to complete what I have to say, and then I shall be glad to yield.

I have voted for the 2-year statute of limitations covering the collection of back pay. I agreed to that as a compromise measure last year, and I still adhere to that agreement. But I cannot vote to deprive the little fellow of the only chance he has in the world of collecting the few dollars which may be due him and which mean such a tremendous amount to him.

I believe that if we were to enact this legislation, and it should be upheld in court, it would probably be the greatest boon to labor unions they have had in many years, because it would force the unorganized employees to join a union in order to get a contract and thereby protect their rights.

Those who advocate the bill most strongly do not themselves like all features of it. They say that some parts of it may not be upheld. They also say that if some parts of it are wrong the courts, through interpretation, can make a good act of it. It seems to me, Mr. President, that if the courts, through interpretation, can make a good act of it, the courts can also handle the situation by which we are now confronted and which has grown out of the pending litigation. It seems to me that if the courts are able to take a bad bill passed by the Congress and make a good act of it through their interpretations, the courts should also be able to find some way to throw out unjust and unwarranted suits which have been brought, amounting to an aggregate of several billion dollars.

I have had a very difficult time in determining how I should vote on the bill, but when I think of the thousands of little people all over the United States who have a few dollars due them, I cannot vote to deprive them of the last chance they have of getting that money.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I asked the Senator from Vermont to yield to me simply because he was so well expressing my own view. I have had the same difficulty which the Senator has had. I thought that these suits were wrong, that they were unjust, and that we should enact legislation to right that wrong, and for such legislation I would have been glad to vote. But the bill that we have before us now does not accomplish that purpose. In my opinion it creates a greater wrong than it attempts to cure, and I shall not vote for any measure which in my opinion is more wrong than right and which does greater injustice than it attempts to cure. Therefore, Mr. President, upon the final roll call I shall vote "nay."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the final passage of the bill.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, from the time this bill came to the Senate, I did what I could to point out what seemed to me to be the obvious defects contained in the proposed legislation. In reply to all of the letters which I have received from my people in Illinois who were inquiring about portal-to-portal legislation, I have advised them that, in my opinion, the Congress of the United States would be able to enact constructive legislation which would outlaw and make null and void these portal-to-portal suits which have sprung up over the Nation involving billions of dollars. I am satisfied that practically everyone in the Senate believed, when we started to enact this legislation, that portal-to-portal cases and nothing else would be the order of the day. In fact, the Committee on the Judiciary was in that frame of mind when it reported out the first bill on the subject. It had nothing in it except legislation dealing with these portal-to-portal claims. For some cause or other, that bill was recalled from the Senate. It was re-referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. When it came here the second time we found many objectionable provisions in the bill. They were utterly unnecessary in dealing directly with these portal-to-portal suits. Like the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH] and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN], I, too, am at this time somewhat troubled as to what I should do in connection with voting on this bill. I would have no hesitancy in supporting a measure which dealt strictly with the activities of portal-to-portal suits, and I have so advised my constituents, both in public and through the mails. But for the life of me, Mr. President, I cannot understand why it was necessary for the Senate Judiciary Committee to bring in a bill that covers so much territory. I shall never be able to understand why it was necessary for the committee to trespass on the rights of the Committee on Education and Labor in bringing in a measure of this kind. Had a bill of this type, with all the allegations it now contains, been submitted originally to the distinguished President pro tempore, I am satisfied that it would have been referred to the Committee on Education and Labor. In other words, Mr. President, the committee has gone much too far—so far, in fact, that I now prophesy that when the President of the United States receives the bill he will veto it, because at present it contains so many objectionable features which do not deal directly with portal-to-portal activities.

So, Mr. President, if the bill is vetoed and sustained the message will be referred to the Judiciary Committee, and that committee will take another 6 weeks to consider a new bill, and then the loquacious Senator from Missouri will take another 4 days in explaining on the floor of the Senate what the committee bill means. That may happen as a result of the action of certain Senators in trying to cover too many bases at one time. They simply cannot go easy on these matters; they cannot attack the main objective; they believe they must do everything at one time. However, in trying to do too much in this bill, they may be frustrated and will be compelled to start again from scratch. The result will be that the very thing the people of the country are complaining about—legislative delay—will confront us boldly again.

Mr. President, I wanted to vote for an honest-to-goodness portal-to-portal bill, but I cannot support the legislative monstrosity which is before us at this time—a bill filled with unnecessary infirmities from beginning to end.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I believe I opened the debate on this bill. I have refrained from making any comment on it since my brief opening remarks.

Dooley said, on one occasion, that what was needed was common sense. When he was asked about it, he said, "It is the scarcest thing on the market."

Mr. President, all the argument in generalities on this bill does not make for clarity in thinking, either among the Members of the Senate or among people throughout the Nation. There are some persons—of course, there are none in the Senate—who are listening to voices to tell them what they should do and how they should act. Mr. President, there is one dominant voice that should be heard. It is the voice of the Nation.

When any reference is made in a derogatory sense to the labors of the Judiciary Committee, and especially the labors of the subcommittee of that committee, I rise to say that such comments are unsenatorial and against the rules of the Senate, and such statements show the lack of fairness and common sense. The members of the subcommittee and of the full committee have labored as no other committee has labored in the 8 years that I have been a Member of the Senate. They have not brought forth a mouse. They have brought forth a fine, able expression of legislative principles, and it is the result of much hard work on their part. That has been recognized by all Senators who have thought clearly about this measure. The fact that some Senators may disagree with what is provided by the bill is no reason why they should impugn the motives or the judgment of their fellow Senators.

Mr. President, the country has asked for this bill. The judgment of the Senate is that the bill shall pass. In my opinion it will be passed by both Houses of Congress; and in my opinion all the fears of Senators on the other side will be proved to be groundless and their "tears" wasted. Mr. President, this bill does what the country expects the Senate to do—in short, to think straight, to act straight, and to cut across the problem which faces us. It has even been shown, without contradiction, that the RFC refuses to complete loans which it has committed itself to make, simply because it cannot tell what charges in-industry will be subjected to as a result of these suits. The same situation exists as to the banks. Today industry faces paralysis because of these suits. Senators on the other side of the aisle can, if they wish, take the responsibility of voting against the bill. Let them do that if they will; and let the country judge their reasons. I say that, in response to what Senators on the other side of the aisle have said to us. Certainly, Mr. President, first and last we are Americans. Of course, some cannot forget that an election lies ahead; and I congratulate the four or five Senators on the opposition side who have conducted this opposition maneuver on this bill. But I trust that the press has not been totally oblivious to what has been going on, and I trust that the facts will be given to the country. I say that in all seriousness.

Mr. President, we are here to do a job for the country—not for labor, not for management, but for the 140,000,000 of us. I say to you, Mr. President, that the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee has done a magnificent job. It is composed of good, Christian, sincere men who listened to the voices of the labor leaders and their best lawyers and listened to the representatives of management, and then went to work and listened, thank God, to their conscience, and then brought forth a bill of which we can be proud.

I trust that the vote on the bill will demonstrate clearly that we have no fear in what we are doing. I trust that nothing which has been uttered will in any way be interpreted as the voice of the "little red men" who wish to break our country apart—which is what would happen if claims amounting to $7,000,000,000 or $10,000,000,000 against various business and industrial concerns in the United States were validated.

In conclusion, Mr. President, let me say it is the function of Congress to determine policy. The distinguished Senator from Missouri has also said that. Under the Constitution it is not the business of the courts to lay down policy. If we here are doing anything, we are telling the courts just that; and the country will sustain us in our action. I trust the bill will immediately be passed.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hawkes	Myers
Baldwin	Hickenlooper	O'Conor
Ball	Hill	O'Daniel
Barkley	Hoey	O'Mahoney
Brewster	Holland	Overton
Bricker	Ives	Pepper
Bridges	Jenner	Reed

Fulbright	Maybank	Wiley
George	Millikin	Williams
Green	Moore	Wilson
Gurney	Morse	Young
Hatch	Murray

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The question is on the final passage of the bill. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PEPPER (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], who is necessarily absent from the Senate. If the Senator from Maryland were present he would vote "yea." If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] who is necessarily absent from the Senate. On this vote I transfer that pair to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] and will vote. I vote "yea." If the Senator from New York were present he would vote "nay." The Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] is absent by leave of the Senate. If present and voting he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WHERRY. I announce that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON] is absent because of illness.

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. CORDON] is absent by leave of the Senate. If present and voting he would vote "yea."

Mr. LUCAS. I announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] is necessarily absent.

The result was announced—yeas 64, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—64

Baldwin	George	Overton
Ball	Gurney	Reed
Brewster	Hawkes	Revercomb
Bricker	Hickenlooper	Robertson, Va.

NOT VOTING—7

Capehart	Pepper	Wagner
Cordon	Robertson, Wyo.
Hayden	Tydings

So the bill (H. R. 2157) was passed.

The bill as passed is as follows:

PART I

FINDINGS AND POLICY

SECTION 1. The Congress hereby finds that the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 (52 Stat. 1060; 29 U. S. C., ch. 8), as amended, has been interpreted judicially so as to require employers to pay compensation thereunder for activities which were not commonly understood by employees and employers in accordance with practice, custom, understanding, or agreement to be work, thereby creating wholly unexpected liabilities, immense in amount and retroactive in operation, upon employers throughout the country for compensation for such activities and for an additional equal amount as liquidated damages and attorney's fees; with the results that, if the act as so interpreted or claims arising under such interpretations were permitted to stand (1) the credit of many employers would be seriously impaired; (2) payment of such liabilities would bring about the financial ruin of many employers and seriously impair the capital resources of many other employers and would thereby result in drastically reducing industrial operations, curtailing employment and the earning power of employees, and substantially burdening commerce and substantially obstructing the free flow of goods in commerce contrary to the purposes of said act; (3) employees, having engaged in such activities with the understanding and belief that they were already fully compensated therefor by their agreed rates of pay, would receive windfall payments for activities performed by them without any expectation of reward, and for liquidated damages and attorney's fees; (4) the Public Treasury would be deprived of large sums of revenues and public finances would be seriously deranged by claims against the Public Treasury on war contracts and for enormous amounts of refunds of taxes paid in prior years; (5) the cost to the Government of goods and services heretofore and hereafter purchased by its various departments and agencies would be unreasonably increased; and (6) employers and employees would be unable to determine, without extensive, expensive, and prolonged litigation to final judgment in a court of last resort, the amounts owing to employees for such activities previously, now, or hereafter engaged in by employees, and would in many cases be unable to make voluntary settlement, compromise, release, or adjustment of claims of employees arising out of such activities, and there would result the promotion of increasing demands for payment to employees for engaging in activities no compensation for which had been contemplated, by either the employer or employee at the time they were engaged in, to be paid, among the results of such conditions being (a) the stirring up of champertous practices and congestion of courts, (b) extended and continuous uncertainty on the part of industry, both employer and employee, as to the financial condition of productive establishments with consequent halting of expansion and development, retardation of employment, the infliction of hampering restraints and restrictions on commerce and on the development thereof, (c) Nation-wide industrial conflict, unrest and disputes between employees and employers and between employees and employees, and (d) gross inequality of competitive conditions between employers and between industries, thereby interfering substantially with the free flow of goods in commerce, seriously and adversely affecting the revenues of the Federal, State, and local governments and injuriously affecting the national prosperity and general welfare of the United States of America.

The Congress further finds that the varying and extended periods of time for which, under the laws of the several States, potential retroactive liability may be imposed upon employers, has given and will give rise to great difficulties in the sound and orderly conduct of business and industry.

The Congress further finds that all of the foregoing constitutes a substantial burden on commerce and a substantial obstruction to the free flow of goods in commerce, contrary to the purposes of said act.

The Congress, therefore, further finds and declares that it is in the national public interest and for the general welfare, essential to national defense, and necessary to aid, protect, and foster commerce, that said act be amended as hereinafter set forth.

The Congress further finds and declares that all of the results which have arisen or may arise under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, as aforesaid, may (except as to liability for attorney's fees and, in the case of the Bacon-Davis Act, for liquidated damages) arise with respect to the Walsh-Healey and Bacon-Davis Acts and that it is, therefore, in the national public interest and for the general welfare, essential to national defense, and necessary to aid, protect, and foster commerce, that said Walsh-Healey Act and said Bacon-Davis Act be amended, as hereinafter set forth.

PART II

EXISTING CLAIMS

SEC. 2. Relief from portal-to-portal claims under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, the Walsh-Healey and the Bacon-Davis Acts:

(a) No employer shall be subject to any liability or punishment under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, the Walsh-Healey Act or the Bacon-Davis Act on account of the failure of such employer to pay an employee minimum wages, or to pay an employee overtime compensation, for or on account of any activities of an employee engaged in prior to the date of enactment of this act, except those activities which were compensable by either—

(1) an express provision of a written or nonwritten contract in effect, at the time of such activity, between such employee, his agent, or collective-bargaining representative and his employer; or

(2) a custom or practice in effect, at the time of such activity, at the establishment or other place where such employee was employed, covering such activity, not inconsistent with a written or nonwritten contract, in effect at the time of such activity, between such employee, his agent, or collective-bargaining representative and his employer.

For the purposes of this section, no judicial or administrative interpretation of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, the Walsh-Healey Act, or the Bacon-Davis Act shall have the effect of changing any written or nonwritten contract between the employer and employee so as to make compensable any portal-to-portal activities (as defined in section 5); nor shall any provision of any such contract, incorporating by reference as a part thereof such judicial or administrative interpretations, make compensable any such portal-to-portal activities.

(b) Each claim based on any portal-to-portal activities is hereby declared to be and is null and void and unenforceable.

(c) No court shall have jurisdiction of any action for minimum wages, overtime compensation, or liquidated damages under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, the Walsh-Healey Act, or the Bacon-Davis Act, whether instituted prior to, on or after the date of enactment of this act, to the extent that such action seeks to enforce any liability with respect to any claim based on portal-to-portal activities.

SEC. 3. Saving clause: The provisions of section 2 of this act shall not be deemed to release or extinguish or to apply to any penalty or liability incurred under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, the Walsh-Healey Act, or the Bacon-Davis Act prior to the date of enactment of this act which is based upon activities other than portal-to-portal activities.

SEC. 4. Special separability provisions: If, notwithstanding the provisions of section 2 hereof, any claim for pay for minimum wages, or for overtime compensation, based on portal-to-portal activities, for any reason remains valid and enforceable after the date of enactment of this act then, with respect to each such claim and with respect to any action pending on or commenced after such date on such claim, the following contents of this section shall apply:

(a) There shall be no recovery of any amount as liquidated damages.

(b) No court shall require the defendant to pay the whole or any part of the attorney's fee of the plaintiff.

(c) The claimant shall be required with respect to any such claim to bear the burden of proof, which shall include proving the extent of his claim, without the benefit of inference, and under no circumstance shall there be shifted to the employer the burden to come forward with evidence of the amount of activities claimed by the employee to have been engaged in. If the employee fails to carry such burden of proof, then the court shall award judgment to the employer.

(d) Settlement, compromise, release, or satisfaction of such claim before the date of enactment of this act shall be a defense thereto and any other appropriate legal or equitable defense may be pleaded in defense of such claim.

(e) Such claim may be hereafter settled, compromised, released, or satisfied, but only if such settlement, compromise, release, or satisfaction contains a provision that the amount of money, if any, resulting therefrom be distributed equitably among the real parties in interest to such claim.

SEC. 5. Definition: As used in this part, the term "portal-to-portal activities" means those activities which section 2 hereof provides shall not be a basis of liability or punishment under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, the Walsh-Healey Act, or the Bacon-Davis Act.

PART III

FUTURE CLAIMS

SEC. 6. Relief from portal-to-portal claims under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938: The Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, is amended by adding after section 7 of such Act the following new section:

"PORTAL-TO-PORTAL CLAIMS BANNED

"SEC. 7A. No employer shall be subject to any liability or punishment under this act on account of the failure of such employer to pay an employee minimum wages, or to pay an employee overtime compensation, for or on account of any of the following activities, hereinafter termed portal-to-portal activities, of such employee engaged in on or after the date of enactment of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947:

"(a) walking, riding or traveling to and from the actual place of performance of the principal activity or activities which such employee is employed to perform, and

"(b) activities which were preliminary to or postliminary to said principal activity or activities, which occur either prior to the time on any particular workday at which such employee commences, or subsequent to the time on any particular workday at which he ceases, such principal activity or activities: Provided, however, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to any of the foregoing portal-to-portal activities of such employee which is compensable by either—

"(1) an express provision of a written or nonwritten contract in effect, at the time of such activity, between such employee, his agent, or collective-bargaining representative and his employer; or

"(2) a custom or practice in effect, at the time of such activity, at the establishment or other place where such employee is employed, covering such activity, not inconsistent with a written or nonwritten contract, in effect at the time of such activity, between such employee, his agent or collective bargaining representative and his employer.

"For the purposes of this section, no judicial or administrative interpretation of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, shall have the effect of changing any written or nonwritten contract between the employer and employee so as to make compensable any portal-to-portal activities; nor shall any provision of any such contract, incorporating by reference as a part thereof such judicial or administrative interpretations, make compensable any such portal-to-portal activities."

SEC. 7. Relief from portal-to-portal claims under the Walsh-Healey and Bacon-Davis Acts: No employer shall be subject to any liability or punishment under the Walsh-Healey or the Bacon-Davis Act on account of the failure of such employer to pay an employee minimum wages, or to pay an employee overtime compensation, for or on account of any of the following activities, hereinafter termed portal-to-portal activities, of such employee engaged in on or after the date of enactment of this act—

(a) walking, riding, or traveling to and from the actual place of performance of the principal activity or activities which such employee is employed to perform, and

(b) activities which were preliminary to or postliminary to said principal activity or activities,

which occur either prior to the time on any particular workday at which such employee commences, or subsequent to the time on any particular workday at which he ceases, such principal activity or activities: Provided, however, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to any of the foregoing portal-to-portal activities of such employee which is compensable by either—

(1) an express provision of a written or nonwritten contract in effect, at the time of such activity, between such employee, his agent, or collective-bargaining representative and his employer; or

(2) a custom or practice in effect, at the time of such activity, at the establishment or other place where such employee is employed, covering such activity, not inconsistent with a written or nonwritten contract, in effect at the time of such activity, between such employee, his agent, or collective-bargaining representative and his employer.

For the purposes of this section, no judicial or administrative interpretation of the Walsh-Healey Act or the Bacon-Davis Act shall have the effect of changing any written or nonwritten contract between the employer and employee so as to make compensable any portal-to-portal activities; nor shall any provision of any such contract incorporating by reference as a part thereof such judicial or administrative interpretations, make compensable any such portal-to-portal activities.

PART IV

MISCELLANEOUS

SEC. 8. Representative actions banned.—

(a) The second sentence of section 16 (b) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, is amended to read as follows: "Action to recover such liability may be maintained in any court of competent jurisdiction by any one or more employees for and in behalf of himself or themselves and other employees similarly situated; and such action shall be deemed to have been commenced as to any individual claimant as of the date when such claimant is named in such action as a party thereto. No employee shall be made a party plaintiff to any such action unless he gives his consent in writing to become such a party and such consent is filed in the court in which such action is brought."

(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) of this section shall be applicable with respect to any claim accruing under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, on or after the date of enactment of this Act.

SEC. 9. Limitations: The Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, is further amended by adding at the end of section 16 the following new subsection:

"(c) (1) Every claim under this act for unpaid minimum wages, unpaid overtime compensation, or an additional amount as liquidated damages, accruing prior to or on or after the date of enactment of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947, shall be forever barred unless, within 2 years after such claim accrued, suit to enforce such claim is commenced in a court of competent jurisdiction.

"(2) Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (1) of this subsection, suit to enforce any such claim accruing prior to the date of enactment of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947 may be commenced within 120 days after such date if such claim is not barred at the time of commencing suit by any other statute of limitations; and the period of limitation provided for in paragraph (1) of this subsection shall not be applicable to any suit so commenced.

"(3) Any such claim, if based on portal-to-portal activities as defined in section 5 of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947; and any suit thereon, shall be subject to the provisions of section 4 of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947."

(b) (1) Every claim under the Walsh-Healey Act or the Bacon-Davis Act or unpaid minimum wages or unpaid overtime compensation, and under the Walsh-Healey Act for an additional amount as liquidated or other damages, accruing prior to or on or after the date of enactment of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947, shall be forever barred unless, within 2 years after such claim accrued, suit to enforce such claim is commenced in a court of competent jurisdiction.

(2) Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (1) of this subsection, suit to enforce any such claim accruing prior to the date of enactment of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947 may be commenced within 120 days after such date; and the period of limitation provided for in paragraph (1) of this subsection shall not be applicable to any suit so commenced.

(3) Any such claim, if based on portal-to-portal activities as defined in section 5 of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947, and any suit thereon, shall be subject to the provisions of section 4 of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947.

SEC. 10. Reliance on administrative rulings.—

(1) The Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, is further amended by adding at the end of section 16 the following new subsection:

"(d) Neither punishment under section 15 or 16 (a) of this act, nor liability for an additional amount as liquidated damages under section 16 (b) of this act, shall be predicated on any act done or omitted in good faith, prior to, on, or after the date of enactment of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947, in accordance with or in reliance on any regulation, order, interpretation, or ruling of the Administrator in writing, notwithstanding the fact that such regulation, order, interpretation, or ruling, after such act or omission, is amended or rescinded or is determined by judicial authority to be invalid or without legal effect."

(2) No liability for an additional amount as liquidated or other damages under the Walsh-Healey Act shall be predicated on any act done or omitted in good faith, prior to, on, or after the date of enactment of the Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947, in accordance with or in reliance on any regulation, order, interpretation, or ruling of the Secretary of Labor (or any Federal official utilized by him to assist in the administration of the Walsh-Healey Act), in writing, notwithstanding the fact that such regulation, order, interpretation, or ruling, after such act or omission, is amended or rescinded or is determined by judicial authority to be invalid or without legal effect.

SEC. 11. Definitions.—

(a) When the terms "person," "commerce," "employer," "employee," and "wage" are used in this act in relation to the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, they shall have the same meaning as when used in such act of 1938.

(b) When the term "employer" is used in this act in relation to the Walsh-Healey Act or Bacon-Davis Act it shall mean the contractor or subcontractor covered by such acts.

(c) When the term "employee" is used in this act in relation to the Walsh-Healey Act or the Bacon-Davis Act it shall mean any person employed by the contractor or subcontractor covered by such acts in the performance of his contract or subcontract.

(d) The term "Walsh-Healey Act" means the act entitled "An act to provide conditions for the purchase of supplies and the making of contracts by the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1936 (49 Stat. 2036), as amended; and the term "Bacon-Davis Act" means the act entitled "An act to amend the act approved March 3, 1931, relating to the rate of wages for laborers and mechanics employed by contractors and subcontractors on public buildings," approved August 30, 1935 (49 Stat. 1011), as amended.

SEC. 12. Separability: If any provision of this act or the application of such provision to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the remainder of this act and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

SEC. 13. Short title: This act may be cited as the "Portal-to-Portal Act of 1947."

Amend the title so as to read: "An act to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, the Walsh-Healey Act, and the Bacon-Davis Act, and for other purposes."

Mr. DONNELL. My attention has been called by the desk to the fact that at the conclusion of line 4 on page 2 of the Wherry amendment to the committee bill which has just been passed, there should have been inserted quotation marks. I ask unanimous consent that the clerks may be authorized to insert the quotation marks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. IVES in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist on its amendments, request a conference with the House thereon, and that the Chair appoint conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. WILEY, Mr. DONNELL, Mr. COOPER, Mr. EASTLAND, and Mr. MCGRATH conferees on the part of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. WHITE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGE REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. IVES in the chair) laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States submitting the nomination of Edwin F. Stanton, of California, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to Siam, whch was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the nominations on the Executive Calendar.

TENNEESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Gordon R. Clapp, of Tennessee, to be a member of the Board of Directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I ask that that nomination be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The nomination will be passed over.

ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations to the Atomic Energy Commission.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I ask that all the nominations under the heading "Atomic Energy Commission" be passed over at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nominations to the Atomic Energy Commission will be passed over at this time.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Garrison Norton, New York, to be an Assistant Secretary of State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Diplomatic and Foreign Service.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the nominations in the Diplomatic and Foreign Service be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations in the Diplomatic and Foreign Service are confirmed en bloc.

That concludes the Executive Calendar.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President may be notified of the action of the Senate upon the nominations this day confirmed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the President will be so notified.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. WHITE. I now move that the Senate resume the consideration of legislative business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of legislative business.

PROGRAM FOR THE SENATE

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, we have been asked by a number of Senators whether we intend to hold a session Monday night. It is not the present intention to have a night session on Monday night or on next Wednesday night. If the pressure of business becomes too great, we may have to begin night meetings, but we have not at present planned night sessions either for Monday or Wednesday of next week.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I understand that it is proposed now to make the nominations to the Atomic Energy Commission on the Executive Calendar the pending business.

Mr. WHITE. In executive session; that is correct.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Will the Senator from Maine yield to me so that I may address a question to the able Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WHITE. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I call the attention of the able Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Policy Committee, to the fact that, as he well knows, we have many pieces of legislation coming on with the March 31 deadline. From all indications, the debate on the nominations of Lilienthal and other members of the Atomic Energy Commission will take perhaps a week or 10 days. Would it not be wise under those circumstances, inasmuch as we could gain about a day, every two evenings, to have evening sessions next week? I wish to say as one member of the Atomic Energy Committee that I shall object to running in any additional legislation ahead of the nominations, unless we can proceed with dispatch.

Mr. TAFT. It was my intention to ask the Senate on Monday to call the calendar, and if certain of the incidental legislation that requires prompt action cannot be passed on the calendar, to take them up after the calendar, to try to dispose of them on Monday. I doubt if we will finally reach the Lilienthal matter until Monday afternoon or Tuesday. I hope it will not then be necessary to interrupt the debate on the nominations, although perhaps after 2 or 3 days it is conceivable that there may be something with a deadline which may perhaps require an evening meeting.

Mr. WHITE. May I respond, Mr. President, to what the Senator from Ohio has said?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine.

Mr. WHITE. The statement made by the Senator from Ohio accords fully with my understanding of the situation and of the desires of the membership, and I was later to make a similar announcement. The announcement by the Senator from Ohio seems fully to cover the ground.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, the only reason I raised this question was, it was my understanding that the Lilienthal nomination would come up as soon as we finished the portal-to-portal bill. I fully understand the procedure being suggested by the able majority leader, and I have no objection to that. The reason I rose to my feet at this time was because it seemed to me that the serving of notice on the Members of the Senate that there would not be an evening session Monday, or would not be an evening session Wednesday, and perhaps not Friday, under those same circumstances, might encourage Senators to make arrangements to be away on those evenings.

It is my belief that the Senate should proceed quickly to consider the Lilienthal nomination, which is one of the most important matters now facing the Nation. In the field of the development of atomic energy we have lost approximately 18 months, and it seems to me that that matter should be proceeded with promptly, and I believe that evening sessions should be in order.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHITE. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. We have received a formal request from the correspondents who are in attendance upon the Senate and otherwise, that no evening session be held on next Wednesday because that will be legislative night at the Press Club. We felt that the correspondents had made every effort to meet upon some other night, and were unable to do so, and we yielded to their request as to next Wednesday evening. Arrangement has not been made for holding night sessions on any other day, and therefore I think we must wait until we see whether on Monday we can dispose of the various minor measures. I hope we can do so on Monday and then proceed with the Lilienthal nomination. Efforts are being made to iron out differences which may exist as to legislation with respect to various controls. I hope there may be little controversy about those matters.

ASSISTANCE TO GREECE AND TURKEY—AMENDMENT

Mr. VANDENBERG. On behalf of my distinguished colleague from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] and myself, I offer a proposed amendment to S. 938, a bill to provide assistance to Greece and Turkey. It is in the nature of a proposed preamble, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the amendment was received, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, ordered to be printed, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the governments of Greece and Turkey have sought from the Government of the United States immediate financial and other assistance which is necessary for the maintenance of their national integrity and their survival as free nations; and

Whereas the national integrity and survival of these nations are of importance to the security of the United States and of all freedom loving peoples and depend upon the receipt at this time of assistance; and

Whereas the Security Council of the United Nations has recognized the seriousness of the unsettled conditions prevailing on the border between Greece on the one hand and Albania, Bulgaria, and Yugoslavia on the other, and, if the present emergency is met, may subsequently assume full responsibility for this phase of the problem as a result of the investigation which its commission is currently conducting; and

Whereas the food and agriculture organization mission for Greece recognized the necessity that Greece receive financial and economic assistance and recommended that Greece request such assistance from the appropriate agencies of the United Nations and from the Governments of the United States and the United Kingdom; and

Whereas the United Nations is not now in a position to furnish to Greece and Turkey the financial and economic assistance which is immediately required; and

Whereas the furnishing of such assistance to Greece and Turkey by the United States will contribute to the freedom and independence of all members of the United Nations in conformity with the principles and purposes of the Charter: Now, therefore,

Be it enacted, etc.

NATIONAL HOUSING PROGRAM FOR EDUCATION AND TRAINING OF WAR VETERANS

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to introduce for proper reference a bill and also ask unanimous consent to have an explanation of the bill printed at this point in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bill will be received and appropriately referred, and without objection, the statement presented by the Senator from Vermont will be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 971) to amend title V of the act entitled "An act to expedite the provision of housing in connection with the national defense, and for other purposes," approved October 14, 1940, as amended, to authorize the Federal Works Administrator to make grants to institutions of higher learning for the construction of educational facilities required in the education and training of war veterans, introduced by Mr. AIKEN, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

The statement presented by Mr. AIKEN was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR GEORGE D. AIKEN IN CONNECTION WITH THE INTRODUCTION OF A BILL TO AUTHORIZE THE FEDERAL WORKS ADMINISTRATOR TO MAKE GRANTS TO INSTITUTIONS OF HIGHER LEARNING FOR THE CONSTRUCTION OF EDUCATIONAL FACILITIES REQUIRED IN THE EDUCATION AND TRAINING OF WAR VETERANS

When the colleges opened last September 1,090,000 veterans were enrolled for full-time instruction in our institutions of higher education. These veterans swelled college enrollment from the 800,000 of the year before and the 1,490,000 enrolled in the previous peak year 1939–40 to a total of a little over 2,000,000 students. Incomplete reports for the second semester beginning in February show a still further increase of approximately 100,000 veterans in our colleges and universities over the number who were there last September. To meet this unprecedented increase in college enrollment and to carry out the implied contract between the Federal government and our educational institutions to provide educational opportunities for every able veteran who chooses to take advantage of the GI bill, colleges and universities, State and local governments, and the Federal Government have worked hand in hand.

Due to the scarcity of building materials and the immediacy of the demand, it was necessary to provide temporary housing and temporary classrooms and laboratories if institutions were to accept veterans through increasing their capacity for enrollment. Exact figures are not available but a careful analysis of just twelve institutions enrolling 74,000 veterans showed that they had themselves expended $5,462,000 for temporary facilities; the Federal Government has spent $8,369,000 for these same institutions. Put in national terms, the Federal Government has spent $75,000,000 for temporary classrooms, laboratories and other non-housing construction and in addition perhaps $200,000,000 for colleges and universities out of the $411,000,000 appropriated for temporary housing. If this same ratio of 5 to 8 in terms of relative expenditure holds for the Nation, then the institutions have spent for nonquota housing for site preparation and other expenditure for temporary structure something over $200,000,000.

These expenditures on the part of both the institutions and the Federal Government have been necessary to meet the immediate emergency especially since permanent building materials were not available. Data indicate clearly that temporary structures cost approximately five-eighths as much as permanent structures and in addition the cost of operation and maintenance is very much greater. The great majority of these structures cannot be used more than 3 to 5 years even if the present law is repealed requiring their demolition within 2 years after the termination of the war.

If it were assumed that present enrollment in colleges and universities would remain constant, the demand for the immediate construction of permanent buildings is imperative. Temporary buildings have met only a part of the need, facilities are grossly inadequate for classrooms, laboratories, infirmaries, study halls, and libraries, and gymnasiums to meet the needs of the veterans now enrolled. Add to this need that resulting from the necessary demolition of present temporary structures and the financial investment which institutions must make becomes more than they are able to take care of in the light of the vast sums they have invested in the temporary structures. But, colleges and universities do not face a stable population. The number of veterans will continue to increase at least through 1950-51. More than 3,000,000 veterans who have not entered into educational institutions have already taken out their certificates of eligibility and entitlement. Since the average length of time that the veteran is entitled to education is 4 academic years, the estimate of an enrollment of 3,000,000 by 1950-51, more than half of whom will be veterans, is conservative.

One further factor bears upon granting assistance to colleges and universities for permanent construction. I have indicated that the maximum number of veterans in colleges will probably not come until 1950-51—an estimate concurred in by the Veterans' Administration—but the present GI bill gives the veteran 4 years after the termination of the war in which to begin his education and 9 years in which to complete it. Since the war has not been terminated, the minimum period of time in which large numbers of veterans will be enrolled in our colleges and universities is 9 years and already legislation has been introduced which will still further extend this time limit.

The United States Office of Education has certified institutional needs for non-housing construction of more than 12,000,000 square feet of floor space in excess of that which can be made available through appropriations for temporary facilities. Educational institutions stated that they would require a total of 52,000,000 square feet of floor space adequately to instruct veterans now enrolled and would need 41,000,000 more square feet to take care of the anticipated increase in veterans over the next 2 years.

States and institutions are willing and eager to expend their own funds for permanent construction. Due to the increase in construction cost resulting from the war, funds that in 1939 would have been adequate, now have declined in real value to the point that funds then available will not now meet more than a small proportion of the desperate need of educational institutions. The Congress has assured that established educational institutions will provide opportunity for all veterans who wish to procure an education. As I previously stated, the institutions, State and local governments, and the Federal Government have joined hands. The need has been partially met, but only partially. It can be met in full only by cooperating now still further in assisting institutions on a grant-in-aid basis to erect permanent structures, the need for which is demonstrated by the increase in enrollment resulting from veterans and is certified to by the United States Office of Education.

The bill which I have offered would add to the Lanham Act, as amended, a new section (sec. 505), providing that whenever the United States Commissioner of Education finds that there exists or impends at any institution of higher learning an acute shortage of educational facilities required for war veterans, engaged in the pursuit of courses of training or education under title II of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944, as amended, the Federal Works Administrator is authorized to make grants to such institution to aid in financing the cost of educational facilities to relieve the shortage.

I call particular attention to the features of this bill which provide that there shall be no Federal supervision or control over educational institutions that participate in this program, and that the institutions themselves shall bear at least 50 percent of the costs or construction under this program.

Funds appropriated under this bill shall not be available for obligation for new projects after June 30, 1948, or for any project which in the determination of the Federal Works Administrator cannot be commenced prior to December 31, 1948.

Seventy-five percent of the funds shall be apportioned among the States on the basis of the number of State veterans eligible for education and training under the GI bill. The remaining 25 percent of the funds shall be apportioned as the Federal Works Administrator may determine.

The bill authorizes the appropriation of $250,000,000 for carrying out this program and for administration expenses.

DECLARATION OF PUBLIC POWER POLICY

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 972) to declare the policy of the United States with respect to hydroelectric power generated in connection with federally financed water development projects and to provide procedures for carrying out such policy, introduced by Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Works.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, inasmuch as the bill proposes to set forth a public power policy, and further, inasmuch as the bill is not lengthy, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the bill be printed at this point in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 972) was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the Federal Power Policy Act.

Section 1. It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States that in order to develop, conserve, and protect our natural resources, flood control, reclamation, and navigation projects shall be constructed, operated, and maintained, and that hydroelectric energy, where economically sound and feasible, shall be developed as an incident to such public works when approved, authorized, and appropriated for by the Congress: Provided, That the revenues to be derived from the sale of energy developed at any project shall be estimated and when collected shall be credited to the cost and maintenance of such project.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 2. (a) As used herein, "project power" means hydroelectric power and energy generated by Government-owned generating facilities at any Federal water-development project and used in the operation of such project and the facilities and appurtenances of its primary purpose; and may include such power and energy consumed in the operation of recreational or other authorized purposes in connection therewith, and power and energy delivered to other federally owned and operated facilities for their own use and not for resale.

(b) "Excess hydropower" means that hydroelectric power and energy generated by Government-owned generating facilities at any such project in excess of project power.

(c) "The Commission" means the Federal Power Commission.

DUTY TO MAKE RECOMMENDATIONS PRIOR TO AUTHORIZATION AND APPROPRIATION

SEC. 3. Prior to any authorization by the Congress for the construction of any Federal water development project, and prior to any appropriation therefor, any agency proposing or recommending same shall make and report to the Congress recommendations as to (a) the engineering feasibility of the proposed construction; (b) the estimated cost of the proposed construction; (c) the primary purpose of such project, whether for reclamation, irrigation, navigation, flood control, or any other purpose; (d) if the proposed construction includes hydroelectric generating facilities, the proportionate part of the estimated cost of each of the various purposes; (e) the cost and value of hydroelectric power and energy to be generated at such project; (f) the market availability for excess hydro power; (g) the economic feasibility of returning to the United States the estimated cost properly allocated to hydroelectric capacity and energy and the period of such amortization. Provided, however, That any plans, investigations, or recommendations made under the provisions of this section shall conform in all requirements to the provisions of section I of the Flood Control Act of 1944 (act of December 22, 1944); and said recommendations, investigations, and reports shall be advisory only and all final determinations shall be made by the Congress.

DUTY TO REPORT PORTION OF PROJECT TO BE DEVOTED TO FLOOD CONTROL

SEC. 4. If one of the purposes of any such project is the production of hydroelectric power in connection with the control of flood water, the agency recommending the construction of such project shall report to the Congress that portion of the water-storage capacity of the reservoir to be created which will be devoted to flood control and the Congress in authorizing the same shall be deemed to have dedicated by statute that portion of such reservoir to flood control, and thereafter no part of the water-storage capacity used for the production of hydroelectric power shall be permitted to encroach upon the storage capacity so dedicated to flood control.

DUTY TO SELL EXCESS HYDRO POWER AT WHOLESALE

SEC. 5. Excess hydro power, as defined herein, generated at any Federal water development project shall be delivered to the Federal Power Commission by the Federal agency which is operating the project for its primary purpose. Such excess hydro power as defined herein shall be sold by the Commission (a) at the dam site or point of production or from transmission lines owned and operated by Federal agencies; (b) without discrimination as to price or availability; (c) at rates as provided in section 7 hereof; and (d) at wholesale to persons or corporations, municipal or private, engaged in distributing and selling electric power and energy primarily to ultimate users; provided that preference in the use of any power and energy shall be given to the project producing such energy in such amount as may be necessary for the proper operation of such project and its appurtenances and provided further that preference in availability in the sale of excess hydro power by the Commission under subsection (d) shall be given as follows: (1) to rural electric cooperative corporations, financed in whole or in part by Federal funds, which are engaged only in rendering service to persons in rural areas not receiving central station service as restricted by the Rural Electrification Act of 1936 and amendments thereto: (2) to organizations created by State law operating irrigation and water projects without profit; (3) to any Federal institution maintained in whole or in part by funds provided by the Federal Government for its own use and not for resale and (4) to other purchasers defined in subsection (d) of this section.

FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION GIVEN JURISDICTION OVER RATES AND CONTRACTS

SEC. 6. Contracts for the sale of excess hydro power and rates therefor shall be subject to approval by the Federal Power Commission, which is required to give full effect to the Project Authorization Act and to this act.

ELEMENTS IN FIXING RATES OF SALE

SEC. 7. The rates charged for sale of excess power from each project shall take into consideration (a) the value thereof as determined by the Congress as the time of authorization; (b) the determinations of the Congress upon which authorization and appropriations were based; (c) the use of project power; and (d) an increment sufficient to amortize over a reasonable period of years that portion of the project costs allocated to irrigation which under the findings on which the project authorization is based, are not defrayed by the water users of the project. In no event shall such rates be less than is required to provide a return above operating, maintenance, and replacement costs sufficient to amortize the cost of the hydroelectric portion of the project in a period to be determined by the Congress, and to pay interest on the unpaid portion of the investment assigned to the hydroelectric portion of the project, and, if the project includes reclamation purposes, to afford maximum aid to reclamation commensurate with competitive rate conditions. The purpose of this section is that all the hydroelectric projects heretofore or hereafter authorized shall be self-liquidating and bear their fair share of the public debt.

MONEYS DEPOSITED WITH TREASURY

SEC. 8. All amounts of money collected by the Commission from the sale of such excess hydro power shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States for disposition in accordance with existing law.

DUTY TO FOLLOW SOUND ACCOUNTING PRACTICES

SEC. 9. With respect to each project and sales of excess hydro power therefrom, the Commission shall account therefor in accordance with the uniform system of accounts provided by the Commission for private companies, and such agency shall, at the end of each fiscal year, file a full and complete report of its operation with the President of the United States and with the Congress.

SHALL NOT ACQUIRE PLANTS OR LINES TO GO INTO ELECTRIC BUSINESS

SEC. 10. No Federal agency shall construct or acquire hydroelectric plants or projects which have the generation of electric power and energy as their primary purpose. No Federal agency shall construct or acquire transmission lines except upon specific authorization made therefor by the Congress.

FINDINGS MUST BE ON HEARINGS UNDER ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEDURE ACT

SEC. 11. Any rate approved or any finding or determination made by the Federal Power Commission, or by any other commission, agency, or instrumentality of the United States, under the provisions of any Federal statute bearing on the generation, marketing, sale, or transmission, of hydroelectric power and energy, including, but not being limited to, this act and the Flood Control Act of 1944, shall be subject to the provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act; and all persons, firms, or corporations affected by any such approval, findings, or determinations are hereby given a litigable interest in the subject matter thereof to the end that their rights may be asserted and adjudicated as set out in the Administrative Procedure Act.

APPLICATION OF THIS ACT TO ALL PROJECTS

SEC. 12. This act shall apply to all Federal water development projects authorized by the Congress and to appropriations hereafter made by the Congress for any such projects, but nothing in this act shall apply to or be construed to repeal the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933, as amended.

REPEAL CLAUSE

SEC. 13. Section V of the Flood Control Act of 1944 (act of December 22, 1944) and all other acts or parts of acts in conflict herewith are hereby repealed. Hereafter all functions of any Federal agency dealing with generation for sale and the sale of hydro power and energy shall hereafter be performed by the Commission in accordance with this act except that nothing in this section shall apply to the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933 and amendments thereto.

EFFECT ON EXISTING CONTRACTS

SEC. 14. Nothing in this act shall affect or invalidate any existing contract heretofore made by the Department of the Interior or extension or renewal thereof for the sale of power and energy, the sale of which was before the passage of this act under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior.

SEC. 15. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I propose to discuss the Government's public power policy. Coming from Oklahoma some Senators may wonder what interest my State has or may have in a public power policy. Very soon Oklahoma will be one of the important producers of hydroelectric power.

At this time we have two such power plants in Oklahoma, one on the Grand River and the other the Denison located on the Red River between my State and the State of Texas.

A third hydroelectric power plant is now under construction at Fort Gibson and a fourth plant at Tenkiller Ferry is advertised for construction.

Two other such plants, one at Oologah and the other at Markham Ferry are authorized for construction.

Then there are three additional proposed plants, one at Eufaula, one at Stone Mountain, and the other at Keystone, all surveyed, approved and reported to the Congress for authorization.

Thus in time we shall have at least nine hydroelectric power plants located in my State of Oklahoma, and it is this program which elicits my interest in the public power policy or program of the Government.

Mr. President, I have just introduced a bill proposing to define the Government's policy with respect to the development, sale, and distribution of hydroelectric energy produced at flood control, reclamation, and navigation projects.

The bill has been referred to the Committee on Public Works for consideration and, later, I hope the bill will be reported to the Senate for further consideration and action.

At the outset let me say I hope the bill, when passed, will promote and expand the development and use of electric energy at the lowest possible cost to consumers.

The bill has been prepared and introduced as the result of a conviction that our domestic economy is being retarded by a lack of power.

The Wall Street Journal of February 14 carried an article which stated that at the present time there is an acute power shortage in the Pacific Northwest.

The article referred specifically to the power now being developed at the Bonneville and Grand Coulee Dams located on the Columbia River.

These two dams are capable of producing some 2,500,000 kilowatts of electric energy, or enough power to serve the city of New York with its 8,000,000 population, and now the demand for power from the two plants is greater than the supply.

I was a Member of the Senate when the two mentioned dams were first proposed for construction.

That was during the dark days of the depression when workers in all parts of the country were idle; hence, the two dams were undertaken in an effort to give employment to a vast number of people not only in the construction of the dams themselves but employment in mines and factories where commodities could be produced for use in not only the construction of the dams but in the development and distribution of hydroelectric energy.

At that time it was freely predicted, even by the sponsors of the two proposed projects, that they would probably be white elephants on the hands of the Government for years to come, if not indefinitely.

As proof of such uncertainty the preliminary plans for the building of the dams provided only for the installation of a few generating units; however, while the dams were being constructed the demand for power increased so rapidly that additional generating units were appropriated for before the dams were completed.

At the present time the demand for power in the Pacific Northwest is so great that the Bonneville and Grand Coulee Dams together with other plants are not able to meet the demands for power.

It appears from the article just mentioned that an agreement has been reached between the management of the said public-power dams and the heads of private utilities providing that the Government shall develop the electric energy and that the private utilities shall distribute such energy.

The bill just introduced proposes to adopt and establish the basis of such agreement as the public-power policy of the Government.

UNITED STATES HAS NO DEFINITE POWER POLICY

Today we have no definite public power policy; hence, the time is opportune for the consideration of a proposal such as is presented in the bill just introduced.

In the past some feeble efforts have been made in the direction of the development of a public power policy.

During the first session of the Sixty-fifth Congress an amendment was added to the River and Harbor Appropriation Act (sec. 18, 40 Stat. 250) providing for the creation of a Waterways Commission to have general supervision over waterways and water resources for the purposes of navigation and for every useful purpose, but the work of such Commission was subject to the approval of the heads of the several executive departments concerned.

Because of such divided authority no constructive results were accomplished by such Commission.

At later dates the Congress authorized the construction of many power projects such as the TVA, the Bonneville, the Grand Coulee, the Fort Peck, and the Shasta and each such project has laws, rules, and regulations for its individual operation and management.

We now have some $722,500,000 after depreciation reserves invested in the TVA and the 1948 budget recommends some $71,000,000 for extensions.

TWO BILLIONS INVESTED IN PUBLIC POWER PROJECTS

The sums invested in Federal power projects make up a total of some $2,000,000,000 already expended for the production of hydroelectric power.

We have other reclamation, flood control, and navigation projects where power is being produced and we have still other power projects under construction which seem to make it obvious that a definite public power policy should be developed and formally declared as a part of our program for the conservation of our natural resources.

The development of public hydroelectric energy is already a definite part of our Government's conservation program, but such program is in no sense coordinated.

DIRKSEN BILL, H. R. 59

Representative DIRKSEN has introduced in the House of Representatives a bill—H. R. 59—providing for the creation of the Office of Power Administration for the coordinated administration of all Federal functions pertaining to the generation, distribution and sale of electricity and the regulation of electric utilities.

In explaining to the committee the need for legislation on the subject of the control of public power Representative DIRKSEN said:

Now, I say to you in all candor, gentlemen, that public power today is incomprehensible and not understandable by any man in the United States, including the Congress of the United States. And now let me proceed to prove it. First, let us take legislation for public power: When the TVA wants legislation they will go to the Committee on Armed Service. When REA wants legislation it will go to the Committee on Agriculture; when the Army wants legislation on flood control, or the War Department wants legislation involving power they will go to the Public Works Committee which involves flood control. When those interested in irrigation want money for public power they will go to the Public Lands Committee; when the Federal Power Commission wants legislation it will come to this Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. When the RFC wants some authority with respect to power loans, it will go to the Banking and Currency Committee, and when they want power on an Indian reservation, they will go to Subcommittee on Indian Affairs in the Public Lands Committee. There you have over seven regular legislative committees of the Congress that are dealing with the various aspects of public power; but when you get to the appropriations for public power, the situation is even worse.

I am still quoting Representative DIRKSEN.

When REA wants money, it comes to my committee, the subcommittee on Agriculture Department appropriations. When the Bonneville Power Authority wants money, it goes over before BOB JONES' committee on the Interior appropriations bill; when they want money for public money for power in the irrigation domain, they will go to the Subcommittee on the Interior. If they want money for public power as an incident to reclamation, they will go to the subcommittee on Interior appropriations bill. When the War Department wants some money for flood-control projects where power is involved, it goes to Mr. PLUMLEY's committee, or one of the committees on War Department civil functions. When the Federal Power Commission wants money it will go to the subcommittee on Independent Offices, under Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. When the TVA wants money it will go to Mr. JENSEN'S subcommittee on appropriations, and when they want a little additional money they will go to Mr. Tarver's subcommittee on Deficiency and Supplemental, so we have seven legislative committees of the House that are dealing with public power today, and we have eight subcommittees of the Appropriations Committee that are dealing with various aspects of public power.

Show me one man in the Senate or in the House of Representatives of the United States, or show me one man in the administrative branch of the Government, or you show me a single individual in the United States of America who knows anything much about the coordination of public power and I will make a trip at my own expense to see him, even if he lives on the Pacific coast.

Now then, how are we going to understand this sort of thing unless we finally get around to setting up an Office of Power Administration or a Federal Power Authority, where you can give it single direction from the top, and somebody, particularly the Congress, can finally know what this thing is going to be all about?

The foregoing statement is not an exaggeration. The clash of authority; the duplication and the waste of public funds are under, rather than overstated.

I agree that Representative DIRKSEN has stated ample reasons for the present consideration of a proposal to develop and announce a public power policy.

In connection with the enactment of the flood-control law of 1944 the Congress devoted one section—section 5—to the disposition of electric power and energy generated at reservoir projects under the control of the Secretary of War and directed that such energy be delivered to the Secretary of the Interior for sale in wholesale quantities to "facilities owned by the Federal Government, public bodies, co-operatives, and privately owned companies."

NO EFFECTIVE LAW ON POWER

To date, no general law has been enacted to govern the sale and distribution of hydroelectric energy developed at reclamation projects.

The bill I have just introduced is intended to establish a coordinated and over-all policy for the sale and distribution of such hydroelectric energy as may be developed at flood control, reclamation, and navigation projects already in existence or to be hereafter constructed.

The text of the bill just introduced was prepared by Charles F. Boots of the office of the Senate legislative counsel from notes submitted by me. Such notes consisted of a speech made in the Senate during the last session in opposition to an item of some $23,000,000 for the Southwestern Power Administration and a portion of a speech made by me on July 1, 1944, at the dedication of the Denison Dam located on the Red River between Oklahoma and Texas.

At that time I said:

Public power, as a rule, is produced as a byproduct of flood control, reclamation, and navigation developments.

The Government should not, in my judgment, enter the field of power development in such a manner as to destroy the value of existing power facilities which have served and are serving the wants and needs of the people.

It seems to me that a cooperative plan of power development and distribution may be worked out whereby the people in the cities and on the farms may receive the benefits of such power at reasonable rates.

Such a plan should embrace a program wherein the Government may create the electrical energy and the existing distributing systems may take the current at the point of manufacture and thereby both the Government and the existing systems may profit by such cooperative plan of operation.

Former Senator James P. Pope, now a director of the Tennessee Valley Authority, has just made the following statement:

There is no doubt but that this cooperative effort, which makes for efficiency, economy, and better service, is here to stay and will play an increasingly important part in the future development of the public and private power industry.

Unless this policy is adopted the Government will be forced to build stand-by steam plants and in addition will have to build transmission and distributing lines in order to deliver the electricity to the consumers.

The Government is interested in making a success of its flood control, reclamation, and navigation power developments.

The public is interested in securing electricity at a reasonable price.

These two interests can be harmonized and adjusted to the benefit of both the Government and the consumers.

This is one of the problems that must be solved and when it is solved it must take into consideration the injury done by removing property from taxation and then it must give credit to the value which may be created as the direct result of the making available of an abundance of cheap power.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT'S POWER POLICY

On January 3, 1946, the Secretary of the Interior released a memorandum wherein he undertook to state and establish a public power policy for our Government. In such memorandum the Secretary set forth the following basic principles:

1. Federal dams shall where feasible include facilities for generating electrical energy.

2. Preference in power sales shall be given to public agencies and cooperatives.

3. Power disposal shall be for the particular benefit of domestic and rural consumers.

4. Power shall be sold at the lowest possible rates consistent with sound business principles.

5. Power disposal shall be such as to encourage widespread use and to prevent monopolization.

In the memorandum the Secretary attempted to state the Government's public power policy, but while in the main sound and correct, such policy and program have not yet been approved by the Congress.

For example, he said in his memorandum that each hydroelectric generating plant "shall have its own steam stand-by and reserve facilities where necessary to independent operation on an economical and efficient basis."

This item of his program has not been approved by the Congress to this date.

An investigation discloses that we now have under the Reclamation Bureau some 32 hydroelectric plants in operation.

Also, that the Reclamation Service now has some 12 additional plants under construction, and, still further, such Service has some 15 plants authorized for construction.

RECLAMATION HYDROELECTRIC PLANTS

This makes a total of 59 hydroelectric plants that under the Secretary's program must have steam stand-by generating facilities and the cost of such facilities will be an additional drain on the Public Treasury.

In addition to the 59 hydroelectric plants, some completed, others under construction and still others authorized, we have some 20 multiple-purpose dams already constructed or being constructed by the Corps of United States Engineers.

The hydroelectric generating plants already in existence or under construction or authorized, number 79, and while perhaps a few of such plants do not and will not need stand-by steam plants, yet it is known and admitted that practically all hydroelectric plants must have stand-by steam plants in order to produce firm power for sale to the consuming public.

In order to make the record complete, I ask permission to print as a part of my remarks a list of the 59 reclamation projects under four headings.

First, a list of 18 projects already constructed and being operated by the Bureau of Reclamation.

The second list contains the names of 14 projects constructed by the Bureau of Reclamation and now being operated by others than such Bureau.

The third list contains the names of 12 reclamation projects now under construction.

The fourth list contains the names of 15 projects authorized but not now under construction.

The statement in four parts asked to be printed contains the names of the several projects, the States in which they are located, the present kilowatt capacity, and the ultimate kilowatt capacity.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Hydroelectric plants on reclamation projects, operating, under construction, or authorized, as of Dec. 31, 1946

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the data referred to shows that the Reclamation Service is now producing some 2,263,800 kilowatts of electric energy and that such projects, together with those under construction and others authorized for construction will, when completed, have a capacity of producing some 6,952,000 kilowatts of electric energy.

So much for the production and proposed production of electric energy under the Bureau of Reclamation.

UNITED STATES ENGINEERS' HYDROELECTRIC PLANTS

In addition to reclamation produced hydroelectric power, we have another Federal agency actively engaged in the production of hydroelectric power, and that is the Corps of United States Engineers, operating as a part of the War Department.

I further ask to have printed as a part of my remarks three lists of multiple-purpose dams under the supervision of the said Corps of Engineers.

The first list contains the names of four multiple-purpose dams already constructed and under operation.

The second list contains the names of 11 multiple-purpose dams now under construction by said Corps of Engineers.

The third list contains the names of five multiple-purpose dams to be initiated by the Corps of Engineers during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1947.

No. 1 list of projects

Multiple-purpose dams constructed by the Corps of Engineers now producing power

Bonneville, Columbia River, Oreg. and Wash.
Fort Peck, Missouri River, Mont.
Denison, Red River, Tex. and Okla.
Norfork, North Fork of White River, Ark.

No. 2 list of projects

Multiple-purpose dams now under construction by the Corps of Engineers at which power will be produced

Buggs Island, Roanoke River, Va. and N. C.
Clark Hill, Savannah River, S. C. and Ga.
Allatoona, Etowah River, Ga.
Narrows, Little Missouri River, Ark.
Bull Shoals, White River, Ark. and Mo.
Fort Gibson, Grand River, Okla.
Fort Randall, Missouri River, S. Dak.
Garrison, Missouri River, N. Dak.
Wolf Creek, Cumberland River, Ky.
Center Hill, Caney Fork River, Tenn.
Dale Hollow, Obey River, Tenn. and Ky.

Number 3 list of projects

Multiple-purpose dams to be initiated by the Corps of Engineers during fiscal year 1947 at which power will be produced

McNary, Columbia River, Wash. and Oreg.
Sault Ste. Marie, St. Marys River, Mich.
Blakely Mountain, Ouachita River, Ark.
Whitney, Brazos River, Tex.
Tenkiller Ferry, Illinois River, Okla.

The data authorized to be printed show that the Bonneville power project was constructed by the Corps of Engineers and the power being produced is sold and distributed by the Bonneville Power Administration, under the supervision of the Department of the Interior. This is the exact program that is proposed in the bill save that under the bill such power is to be disposed of by the Federal Power Commission.

STAND-BY STEAM PLANTS NECESSARY

The several lists of public power projects—reclamation and flood control—total some 78, and if the Government should decide to follow the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior and construct steam stand-by and reserve facilities at each of the said dams, then a total of some 78 steam stand-by plants and facilities remain to be constructed as a part of our public-power program.

The reclamation plants constructed and authorized will generate some 6,952,000 kilowatts and the United States engineers flood-control plants constructed and under construction will generate some 4,092,800 kilowatts or a total of some 11,044,800 kilowatts of electric energy.

It must be admitted that at each hydroelectric plant, to the extent that the water supply is not firm and constant, steam stand-by plants must be provided, hence the issue arises as to whom—the Government or the local private utility—shall provide such plants. If by the Government—then the stand-by plants will yet have to be built, but if by the local utilities then such steam plants are already constructed and now in service.

If built by the Government the size and cost of such plants would be controlled by the amount of power necessary to be produced at any hydroelectric facility; hence, the cost of the several stand-by steam plants would vary somewhat at the respective hydropower developments.

The total expenditures for the construction of the necessary stand-by steam plants will be governed by the total amount of stand-by electric energy needed to make firm all power sold by the Government under contract.

If only one-half of the total estimated hydroelectric power is to be insured by stand-by steam plants then we will have to construct plants to produce a total of some 5,522,400 kilowatts of electric energy.

The former cost of buildings, machinery, and equipment necessary to produce steam electric energy was some $100 per kilowatt. A more recent estimate is $125 per kilowatt, but at $115 cost per kilowatt the stand-by steam plants will cost some $635,076,000.

If the Secretary's recommendation should be carried out, in addition to stand-by steam plants, transmission, and distribution lines would have to be constructed—all at the expense of the Federal Treasury and such outlay of Federal funds will be even more than the cost of the stand-by steam plants.

Further, in addition to the expenses mentioned a vast personnel would have to be assembled to carry on the work of the vast electrical empire provided by the nationalization or near nationalization of electrical energy.

REA COOPERATIVES HAVE FIRST PRIORITY ON PUBLIC POWER

At this point I call attention to another item that has never been made clear to the consumers of electricity. This explanation is made for the benefit of the 1,009 electric cooperatives—forming the Nation-wide rural electrification program, which, under the provisions of the bill, have first priority for the power developed at reclamation and flood-control hydroelectric projects.

The said 1,009 cooperatives now serve some 1,675,228 rural consumers. The number of such consumers is increasing rapidly and it is estimated that when the REA program is completed we will have more than one-half of our rural population served with REA electric energy.

It is obvious that REA subscribers and consumers—one of whom I am—want electric energy and service at the lowest cost consistent with sound business principles.

I am a member of the Cotton Electric Cooperative, with headquarters at Walters, Okla. My yearly rate is $18 for the first 180 kilowatt-hours used. On the excess of this amount the rate is 5 cents for the first 100 kilowatt-hours and 3 cents each for all in excess of that amount.

If figured and paid by the month, the rate will be 10 cents each for the first 30 kilowatt-hours, or $2.95 if there is as many as 30 kilowatt-hours used. The next 50 kilowatt-hours at 5 cents each and the next 920 kilowatt-hours at 2½ cents each. The next 2,000 kilowatt-hours at 2 cents each and all over that at 0.01¾ cent each. With such rates in effect in my section of Oklahoma, I am certainly in favor of any bill or program that will give us cheaper power.

To the subscriber or consumer not versed in the cost of developing and distributing electric energy it might seem that the entire monthly bill was to cover the cost of the single item—the amount of energy consumed.

An analysis of an REA electric-light statement, or bill, as it is commonly called, will show that the subscriber or consumer is paying not for just electric energy but for at least eight distinct items, which may be listed as follows:

1. Interest on the cooperative Federal loan;
2. Amortization of such loan;
3. Cost of operating the cooperative;
4. Cost of maintenance;
5. Cost of collecting;
6. Miscellaneous;
7. Depreciation; and
8. Cost of energy consumed.

The items of cost, as listed, do not cover the line loss which is a charge against the cooperative—hence a charge against the members of such cooperative.

IF ELECTRICITY IS FREE MONTHLY BILL STILL LARGE

An analysis of such a statement will show that only a relatively small part of the total bill is to pay for the current or electric energy consumed so that if the cost of the current or electric energy was zero or free the subscriber or consumer would have a sizable monthly bill to pay.

In the case of my Cotton Electric Cooperative the amount of my bill for items other than for current or electric energy is some 80 percent, leaving 20 percent for the payment of the current or energy consumed.

On a $10 monthly bill from $1.15 to $2.50 is for current or energy and the balance, from $7.50 to $8.85, is for interest, amortization, operation, maintenance, depreciation, and miscellaneous expenses.

In Oklahoma the percentage of costs of current or energy with respect to revenue to cooperatives ranges from 11½ to 25 percent. While the cost of current or electric energy is an important item yet if such current or energy was furnished free the subscribers or consumers would still have sizable bills to meet monthly.

GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP OF ELECTRIC FACILITIES MEANS LOSS OF TAXES

In my State of Oklahoma the electric utilities pay Federal, State, county, municipal, and school-district taxes in the approximate sum of $4,058,000 annually, and while Oklahoma is not a poor State we cannot afford to lose so much revenue to our several public treasuries.

Investigation discloses that the electric-utility companies pay a substantial part of the tax income of the Treasury. During 1945 such companies paid in Federal taxes the sum of $423,000,000 and paid State and local taxes in the sum of $239,000,000, or total taxes in the sum of $662,000,000.

It should be obvious that with a national debt of some $260,000,000,000 and an annual budget of over $30,000,000,000 to meet, it is not the time to expend vast sums in constructing duplicate electric facilities on the one hand and on the other at the same time decrease the tax revenues by either the purchase of existing electric facilities or the construction of duplicate facilities—all of which when in operation would be on the tax-free list.

GALLUP POLL SHOWS PUBLIC SENTIMENT AGAINST GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP AND OPERATION OF ELECTRIC FACILITIES

According to the Gallup poll, public sentiment is against the public ownership and operation of electric-power facilities and companies.

On January 28, 1947, the American Institute of Public Opinion, popularly known as the Gallup poll, released an article containing the following question and answers:

"Do you think the United States Government should own electric-power companies?"

In 1936, 40 percent answered "Yes," 52 percent answered "No," and 8 percent were undecided. In 1945, 29 percent answered "Yes," 50 percent answered "No," and 21 percent were undecided. Today, January 28, 1947, 28 percent answered "Yes," 64 percent answered "No," and 8 percent were undecided.

In the poll article it is stated that "fewer Americans want to see the Federal Government own railroads, banks, or electric-power companies today than was the case a decade ago."

The articles states further that "England's labor government has embarked on a sweeping program on nationalization of electric power, coal mines, transportation, and other key industries. By contrast the American workers, including those who belong to labor unions, vote by a substantial majority in favor of continued private ownership."

The poll referred to shows that the vast majority of the 142,000,000 Americans are neither communistic, fascistic, nor are they socialistic. However, I do not intend to say that those who favor the nationalization of our electrical industry are either Communists, Fascists, or Socialists, but it is obvious that the nationalization of our electric industry is a trend toward the nationalization of all industries and such an accomplishment would change our system of free enterprise to that of a Socialist or communistic economy.

ANALYSIS OF BILL

The first section of the bill just introduced defines the policy of our Government with respect to the development of hydroelectric power.

Section 2 gives definitions.

Section 3 provides that full investigations shall be made prior to authorization and appropriations for the development of hydroelectric energy.

Section 4 provides that the exact part of any reservoir to be used for the production of power shall be set forth definitely and thereafter such report shall be complied with.

Section 5 provides that the excess power produced shall be delivered to the Federal Power Commission for sale and distribution under priorities with rural electric cooperatives having first call for such power.

Section 6 provides that the Federal Power Commission shall have exclusive jurisdiction over rates and contracts. This means that the Government will build, own, and operate the plants, make contracts for the sale of the excess power to local distributors, and in such contracts shall assert the right to control the rates charged by the local distributors in their resales of such power to consumers.

Section 7 suggests the elements to be considered by the Federal Power Commission in fixing the rates of sale to distributors.

Section 8 provides that all money collected by the Commission from the sale of excess power shall be deposited in the United States Treasury.

Section 9 provides that the Commission shall follow sound and approved accounting practices, and shall report to the President and to the Congress.

Section 10 provides that no Federal agency shall construct or acquire hydroelectric plants which have the generation of electric power and energy as their primary purposes.

Section 11 provides for public hearings.

Section 12 provides that the act shall apply to all public water-development projects heretofore or now being constructed or hereafter authorized and appropriated for, but specifically exempts the Tennessee Valley Authority project.

Section 13 is a repeal clause affecting section 5 of the Flood Control Act of 1944, and provides that all things to be done respecting the supervision and sale of hydroelectric power shall be performed by the Federal Power Commission.

Section 14 provides protection for all existing contracts.

Section 15 authorizes appropriation to carry into effect the provisions of the law.

As the author of the bill, I make the following claims:

First. We will avoid the expense of building stand-by steam plants; such expense estimated to be as much as $635,076,000.

Second. We will avoid the expense of building transmission and distributing lines which might cost more than the steam stand-by plants.

Third. We will avoid the expense of a vast personnel which would be necessary to supervise and manage the operation of the plants and offices in connection with the generation and distribution of such hydroelectric power.

Fourth. We will avoid the possible loss of vast sums in Federal income taxes in the sum of $423,000,000 in 1945.

Fifth The States, counties, cities, and local districts will avoid the possible loss of electric-utility taxes in the sum of $239,000,000 in 1945.

In addition to the vast savings to the Treasury and the taxpayers the bill will bring to the Treasury and to the people vast sums as follows:

First. The Federal Treasury will receive the revenue derived from the sales of the power at the dams.

Second. The Treasury will continue to receive the income taxes from the electric utilities which amount to many hundreds of millions of dollars annually.

Third. The stockholders and bond holders will continue to receive dividends and interest from their investments and they in turn will continue to pay income taxes on such income to the Federal Treasury.

Fourth. The consumers will secure electric energy at the lowest possible cost consistent with sound and efficient management—all under the supervision of the Federal Power Commission.

I contend that the bill will stimulate and expand the production of hydroelectric energy by making available more funds for the development of reclamation and flood-control projects.

The funds saved from expenditures on stand-by steam plants, transmission and distributing lines, and personnel will be available for the construction of such projects.

The enactment of the bill into a law will coordinate and concentrate the public power activities of the Government into one Federal agency—the Federal Power Commission now already in existence. This coordination of Government agencies will likewise save the Treasury vast sums of money annually.

To the extent that the program suggested saves expenditures and, in addition, provides additional funds and revenues to the Treasury the bill will assist in balancing the budget and in meeting the costs of the Federal Government.

Summarizing and in conclusion, I contend that the bill, when enacted into law, will do two very unusual things—it will both save money and make money for the Federal, State, city, county, and district treasuries.

It will save money for the Federal Treasury by not incurring the enormous expenses of constructing stand-by steam plants, of transmission and distributing lines and the personnel necessary to supervise and manage such utilities.

The bill will save money for the State, city, county, and district treasuries by preserving for them the taxes they are collecting at the present time.

The bill will make money for the Federal Treasury through the sale of electric energy at the point of manufacture.

The bill will make money for State, city, county, and district treasuries through savings in electric bills and services.

It is my contention that under the provisions of the bill the public interest will be served and at the same time the consumers will secure electric energy and services at the lowest possible rates consistent with sound business principles and efficient management.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY

Mr. WHITE. I move that the Senate adjourn until Monday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 37 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, March 24, 1947, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATION

Executive nomination received by the Senate March 21 (legislative day of February 19), 1947:

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

Edwin F. Stanton, of California, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to Siam.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate March 21 (legislative day of February 19), 1947:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

Garrison Norton to be an Assistant Secretary of State.

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

TO BE FOREIGN SERVICE OFFICERS OF CLASS 2 AND SECRETARIES IN THE DIPLOMATIC SERVICE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

David M. Maynard
Franklin W. Wolf

TO BE FOREIGN SERVICE OFFICER OF CLASS 3, CONSUL, AND SECRETARY IN THE DIPLOMATIC SERVICE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

Claude Courand

TO BE FOREIGN SERVICE OFFICERS OF CLASS 4, CONSULS, AND SECRETARIES IN THE DIPLOMATIC SERVICE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, MARCH 21, 1947

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father of our Lord and Master, harken unto our prayer; we beseech Thee that it may climb to the highest courts of heaven, to Him who wore our human flesh and made Thy love available to all. Separate us from the things that divide us, from the forgetfulness of the things we should remember, and from everything that obscures Thy holy purpose.

Dear Lord, consecrate the homes of our land and cleanse our politics; undismayed, help us to face our problems with truth and honor, that the Congress may be a constant inspiration to all ranks of our citizens. O give us wisdom to discern and courage to do whatever is needful. Grant that the Members may work and plan together in mutual trust, with integrity of character and devotion of purpose. Help us to find our joy in doing Thy will, engendering the spirit of true patriotism, from the chiefest to the humblest. Looking back at the close of these hours, may we feel, with pardonable pride, the sense of Thy approval. In our Saviour's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ROBERTSON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. HILL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include four resolutions adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Colorado.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] be given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a copy of the program of the first national meeting of the Advisory Committee of the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization, to be held next week in Philadelphia, to which all Members of Congress are invited.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

FOREIGN COMMITMENTS

Mr. MATHEWS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. MATHEWS. Mr. Speaker, last night I determined to ask some of the people who are going to pay the bill what they thought of the President's plan of a global crusade against communism. Pointing to a headline in last night's paper, which I hold before me, which says, "Six hundred million dollars asked for aid to Korea," I asked the waitress who served me dinner what she thought about it, since we were already asked to give $400,000,000 to Greece and Turkey. She said, "I think they are taking us for suckers. I think that after we have spent the money the boys will be sent after it to die again."

Mr. Speaker, I intend to ask the people, the butcher, the baker, and the candlestick maker, if I can find one, to find their answers, and, with your permission and with the permission of the Members of the House, I am going to bring back to you 1-minute reports of their answers. They ought to be interesting.

"SORRY, IT'S A SECRET"

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Speaker, I think it is high time someone told the State Department that they are no longer dealing with a rubber-stamp Congress. In the elections of last November 5, the American people voted an end to—among other things—the "era of the blank check."

Yesterday the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House voted out a bill proposing to grant $350,000,000 in food and other aid for devastated nations abroad. It has come to my attention that during the testimony on this bill, the so-called State Department experts refused to give the American people a break-down of where this money is going. In other words, it is the same old New Deal doctrine that the people are too dumb to understand.

I have tried to find out how much of this money is going to Poland, how much to Hungary, to Italy, how much to the other countries. The only answer I have been given, the only answer the American people have gotten from our State Department is "Sorry, it's a secret."

We have gotten into too much trouble already because of these secret deals. I am all in favor, Mr. Speaker, of feeding starving people, but what is so secret about it? It was not a secret when UNRRA did it.

I say, let the American taxpayers in on a few of these secrets. It is their money these free spenders are distributing; they are paying the bills.

GREETINGS FROM GEORGIA

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, in Washington the calendar has decreed that spring begins today. In the Fifth District of Georgia, Mother Nature herself long ago issued that decree, and there the earth is beautiful with daffodils, blue hyacinths, yellow jasmine, and other fragrant and colorful flowers.

Yesterday the De Kalb County Chamber of Commerce sent a truckload of flowers to Washington in compliment to the Nation's lawmakers. They were gathered by Boy Scouts, Girl Scouts, and school children, women's clubs and civic clubs, and this morning 12 charming girls from the Fifth District have placed a bouquet in each Senator's office, and have left a quantity for the Representatives' cloak rooms and dining rooms. You are invited to take them with the compliments of De Kalb County, educational center, county of industry and agriculture, home of Stone Mountain, famous dogwood blossoms, and luscious Georgia peaches.

We expect to share with you here from time to time, and we offer to all our visitors, such examples of Nature's bounty as peaches in May, watermelons in August, apples in September, cane sirup in October, roses in December, and southern hospitality the year around.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. CARSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

[Mr. CARSON addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

REDUCTION OF FEDERAL EXPENDITURES

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, may I say to my friend from Kansas, who cannot get the information he wants from the State Department, that I want to give him some information that we all get every day from the Treasury Department. I want to show you that on the 18th of March we were $258,934,078,366.21 in the red. Where will you get all that money? We have been in the red so long that this Treasury statement, instead of being published in black, ought to be published in red every day, and it should have been published that way for the last 15 years with the squandering and spending of the New Deal. But we are getting information now, and I think that with this Republican Congress we are going to do something about this red sheet. We will make it black or bust. We are going to cut down expenses in this country in a way that nobody ever dreamed of, unnecessary expenses, but if we cut down expenses here for things the American people want, you have to be mighty careful in what you do in spending and giving money to foreign countries. It is serious and critical. That is going to be a very ticklish thing, and you should think about it very sincerely before you vote.

We will cut down spending; we will cut down the debt; we will cut down on your taxes. However, a Government not good enough to support by taxation is not fit to exist. I am not talking of exorbitant taxes like the 14 new tax bills of the last 12 years. We must pay our bills and cut down on our national debt.

A people willing that its Government borrow and borrow and borrow just lacks common sense.

Be careful of your spending are the wisest words I can give you now. Open your eyes and economize.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. HARTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that leave of absence for 2 days, on account of official business, be granted to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACKINNON], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KEARNS], and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LUCAS].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. HARTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

[Mr. HARTLEY addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

GOLD PURCHASING

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, in view of the responsibility of Congress to have before it the fullest information bearing upon the President's recent message to Congress and on the implication of H. R. 2616, it is desirable to know whether this country is pursuing consistent policies.

One of our policies, which is of direct help to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics on economic lines, is the United States official policy of purchasing gold from every source at $35 an ounce.

Before the recent war this policy was suspended in the case of the Axis, because it was pursuing political and economic policies which the administration considered injurious to this country. The question now is: Are we similarly pursuing in the matter of gold buying a policy in conflict with that which the President has just recommended to the Congress? To obtain the administration's views on this important matter I have written the Secretary of the Treasury for information.

ALCOHOL RUBBER INDUSTRY

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call attention to a bill that I am introducing today. Its purpose is to perpetuate our wartime-created alcohol rubber industry and thereby improve the defense of our country. In addition to that, I feel that this proposal can be made to be very beneficial to the farmers of America and can be made to fit in with a sound and constructive program for agriculture.

Mr. Speaker, my proposal is that a manufacturers' excise tax be placed upon all rubber, foreign and domestic, except such rubber as is manufactured or produced in the United States from butadiene, which is produced from grain alcohol.

If natural rubber is selling on the world market for about 15 cents per pound, it is impossible for an American manufacturer to buy high-priced corn, wheat, potatoes, and the countless other products of the farm, turn them into alcohol, and then into rubber, and end up by not having this synthetic rubber cost more than the natural rubber or more than rubber made from petroleum. Consequently, the only way that an alcohol rubber industry can be built up is by giving it certain protection.

At the present time, the plants that made alcohol and rubber during the war are still owned by the Government. I would like to create a situation favorable toward this industry so American businessmen would be induced to buy these plants and operate them. This will make a market for millions and millions of bushels and pounds of surplus crops as well as create a new industry in the United States that will provide employment for many.

I propose this tax advantage not to help any particular businessman or investor, but as part of an agricultural program and as a very essential factor in our defense.

The amount of the tax is something that Congress will have to work out. If, through the Commodity Credit Corporation or other Government agency, these alcohol plants can buy potatoes that might be dumped, soft corn, or other surpluses, at a nominal price, the tax can be effective and still not be very high. If, on the other hand, these plants are to buy ordinary farm products at the supported price, the tax must be higher.

I do feel that it offers a program that is worth trying.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ELLIS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include in each an editorial.

Mr. NODAR asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a speech delivered by the national commander of the Catholic War Veterans on communism.

Mr. BELL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a clipping from the New York Times.

COPPER PRODUCTION

Mr. HARLESS of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARLESS of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. Speaker, we have been hearing a good deal lately about monopolies. The Federal Trade Commission has just released a report which accuses the large copper companies of this country of monopolizing the production of copper. I should like to point out that copper deposits, as is true with most ore bodies, vary in their size, richness, physical conformations, and hence in cost of operation. It happens, then, when the price of copper drops our small and margined high-cost mines are squeezed out of production not, it may be noted, by deliberate intent but due to the accidental economics of supply, demand, and price.

Before the last war only a handful of copper mines could operate due to low metal prices. During the war the premium price plan for copper, lead, and zinc created an economic atmosphere in which marginal mines could live and hundreds of them sprang up into operation. At present, high prices in combination with premiums are keeping these mines alive. The premium-price plan expires June 30, 1947. Prices eventually will fall—and they generally come down faster than they went up. It is inevitable that without the stabilizing influence of the plan, small and marginal mines gradually will be forced to close until only the few low-cost mines will again be left. The cry of monopoly will then be heard with renewed strength.

I should like to call to the attention of the House the established fact that the premium-price plan for copper, lead, and zinc is the best antimonopoly device we yet have seen as far as the mining industry goes. Under it small and marginal mines can thrive, produce metal for necessary industrial and war stock-pile needs and, with good fortune, perhaps grow into large mines.

For the afore-mentioned reasons I have long felt that the continuation of a premium plan in some form is essential. I introduced, early in the session, H. R. 1284 to establish a National Resources Division to administer such a plan. It has received a good deal of favorable comment.

Bills looking toward the same end have been introduced by Mr. ALLEN of Illinois; Mr. HILL, of Colorado; Mr. MEYER, of Kansas; and Mr. RUSSELL, of Nevada. I understand the bill, H. R. 2455, by my friend the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. RUSSELL] may be favorably reported from Public Lands. I sincerely hope so. The mining industry wants and needs this legislation. I intend to support H. R. 2455 vigorously and I trust it will have the favorable consideration of the Members when it comes to the floor for a vote.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BUCHANAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances, in one to include an article from this morning's Washington Post, and in the other the recommendations of the National Committee on Housing concerning veterans' housing.

NATURAL GAS

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, a moment ago the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARSON] called the attention of the House to the introduction of several bills having to do with the study of our gas supply and the use of natural gas. I sincerely trust the fact that the appropriate committee is entering into a study of this important subject will serve as notice to the Federal Power Commission to go slow in the granting of any license to any company acquiring the Big or Little Inch pipe lines. The use of these lines for distribution of gas to the Atlantic seaboard will destroy one of the basic industries of America, and it seems to me that before any license is issued the committe should make a very thorough study of the entire subject.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BOYKIN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include an article from the Montgomery Advertiser.

Mr. LANE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances; in one to include an article from the Christian Science Monitor and in the other to include an editorial from the Telegram News of Lynn, Mass.

TRAIN MEN TO WIN THE PEACE

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, as Americans, we have been capable of superhuman efforts in the waging of war. But when it comes to peace, we have gone to the other extreme. Things will take care of themselves, we say, and follow a policy of drift which inevitably leads to another war.

Our people have sensed the fact that the American diplomatic service is not represented by men of the highest professional skill. They have the fatalistic feeling that the victories which our fighting men have won will be lost by our amateur diplomats.

Foreigners resent American representatives who are forever bragging about our Nation's accomplishments and who show no respect for the lands in which they are guests. It is this failure to try and understand the other nation's viewpoints which has caused us to make so many diplomatic blunders in the past.

We need to establish a United States Foreign Service Academy which will educate men for the highest task of all: That of preserving the peace.

In this atomic age, we cannot play at diplomacy. We have got to have the best of trained men to represent us abroad.

To accomplish this, I believe that we should pass this bill to establish in or near the District of Columbia a United States Foreign Service Academy.

Under the direction of the State Department, it shall train carefully selected applicants in the history, culture, customs, folklore, and languages of the nations in which the diplomatic cadets may elect to serve, and provide for field studies in such nations.

Upon satisfactory completion of the course, the cadets shall be granted the degree of bachelor of arts and shall be given preference in the appointment of permanent officers in the Foreign Service of the United States.

This is the logical way to properly train career men for these posts of high responsibility.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. DURHAM asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article from the Army and Navy Journal.

Mr. FORAND asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a resolution adopted by the Rhode Island General Assembly in support of President Truman's position regarding conditions in Greece.

Mr. LEFEVRE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article by Mark Sullivan.

ON-THE-JOB-TRAINING PROGRAM

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I received the following letter from Lowell, Mass.:

LOWELL, MASS., March 13, 1947.

The Honorable MRS. ROGERS.

DEAR MADAM: What became of the legislation proposed to correct the inequalities in the GI bill of rights pertaining to the on-the-job-training program. There was a good deal of talk about raising the monthly limit of $200 and even increasing the monthly allowance.

I hope something is done about it in the near future; if not, I am afraid I and a few more like me will be forced to give up our training program for lack of a living wage.

Thanking you for past considerations, I remain,

——— ———.

Mr. Speaker, I think there was a great misunderstanding in the House and throughout the country generally when the Committee on Veterans' Affairs raised the ceilings for on-the-job training. The public, and I believe many of the Members, feel that the Government will pay more subsistence allowance under H. R. 246, which was reported unanimously from our committee and is now upon the calendars of the House. That is not the case. No matter what the ceiling is, the Government would not increase the amount under this bill, but would pay no more than the subsistence allowance of $65 for a single veteran and $90 for a married veteran, as is being done at the present time.

In the first GI bill, enacted in 1944, there were no ceilings on wages. However, later amendments to the law permitted a veteran to earn only $110 above the amount paid him in subsistence allowance. Thousands of veterans could not qualify for the allowance under these restrictions, and were dropped from the payment rolls of the Veterans' Administration. Now, in raising the ceilings you are but giving back to these veterans a part of what you took away from them by legislative action last year, and which passed the House under a great misunderstanding.

AMENDING THE NATIONAL ARCHIVES ACT

Mr. REES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to file a supplementary report on the bill H. R. 1350.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague the gentleman from California [Mr. JACKSON] be granted leave of absence for today, Monday, and Tuesday, on account of official business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. KEATING asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances, in one to include a portion of a press release by Gov. Thomas E. Dewey, and in the other a telegram from the Ukrainian American Relief Committee.

Mr. MERROW asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. CRAWFORD asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a statement which carries a few quotations which he is sending to people in his district.

Mr. O'HARA asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an editorial.

ADJOURNMENT OVER AND LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM FOR NEXT WEEK

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK]?

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and, of course, I shall not, but we are interested to know just as much of the program for next week as the gentleman can announce at this time.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, my information is that the Committee on Appropriations expects to report the appropriation bill on Labor and Federal Security in time for its consideration on Monday next. If it is so reported, general debate on the bill will be held on Monday and the bill will be read on Tuesday. If the consideration of that bill is completed sufficiently early on Tuesday, we propose to call up House Resolution 151, which is a resolution from the Rules Committee to reestablish the committee to investigate all matters pertaining to the replacement and conservation of wildlife.

On Wednesday and Thursday we hope to have ready for consideration the tax bill, as I announced yesterday. It is our plan to conclude debate on the bill on Thursday and vote on the bill Thursday evening.

Friday is undetermined. Unless something should develop that would require attention on that date, we might adjourn from Thursday until the following Monday.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK]?

There was no objection.

GOVERNMENT DEBT AND INCOME

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. Speaker, I was very much interested in the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania who read us figures on the record-breaking war debt that the United States Government must carry.

I only hope the gentleman is concerned with both sides of the fiscal program, namely, the income of the Government as well as the outgo. It is amazing to me that in the proposed Knutson tax reduction plan that is coming before us next week reducing income taxes of the very rich by 20 percent, the only way the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee could find to justify that bill—or perhaps deodorize it—was to cut another $350,000,000 out of the Government's revenue. This 350 million is a "tip" given to the lower-income groups to give the Knutson plan a sugar-coating.

If that is the majority party's idea of sound fiscal responsibility, to ignore the necessary income of the Government at a time when we have an all-time high war debt, exceeding any debt that has ever been carried by any government on the face of this globe, then I do not know the meaning of financial responsibility. I believe this Nation wants debt reduction before tax reduction is considered.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY], who just addressed the House, makes me think of a squalling, bawling, suckling calf being separated from its mother. You take these New Dealers away from the public pay roll, get their feet and heads out of the trough where they have been feeding for the last 15 years at the taxpayers' expense, and hear them squall. The only philosophy they know is that of spending—borrowing money, because, as they say, "we owe it to ourselves"—then tax and spend more and more with the hope that they may be reelected. That is their philosophy. If we are foolish enough to go along with that theory and let them keep on spending down at the other end of the Avenue so they can stay in office, then certainly we are dumb. I do not fall for that one. If we cut off these expenses, the budget will balance itself and the spenders may soon be out.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—WORLD HEALTH ORGANIZATION (H. DOC. NO. 177)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States which was read by the Clerk and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I am transmitting herewith for your consideration a suggested joint resolution providing for United States membership and participation in the World Health Organization. I also am enclosing a memorandum from the Secretary of State with reference to United States membership in the World Health Organization.

I have been impressed by the spirit of international good will and community of purpose which have characterized the development of the constitution of this Organization. I am sure that it will make a substantial contribution to the improvement of world health conditions through the years.

In view of the significance and urgency of international health problems, I consider it important that the United States join the World Health Organization as soon as possible. Therefore, I hope that the suggested joint resolution may have the early consideration of Congress.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 21, 1947.

[Enclosures: 1. Joint resolution; 2. Memorandum from Secretary of State.]

TERM OF OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Speaker to lay before the House for immediate consideration House Joint Resolution 27, a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to the terms of office of the President, with Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the joint resolution and the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments, as follows:

Page 1, line 9, strike out all after "SECTION 1." over to and including "term." in line 4, page 2, and insert "No person shall be elected to the office of the President more than twice, and no person who has held the office of President, or acted as President, for more than 2 years of a term to which some other person was elected President shall be elected to the office of the President more than once. But this article shall not apply to any person holding the office of President when this article was proposed by the Congress, and shall not prevent any person who may be holding the office of President, or acting as President, during the term within which this article becomes operative from holding the office of President or acting as President during the remainder of such term."

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, this bill with the Senate amendment was returned to the House on March 13. It was taken informally before the full Committee on the Judiciary, and I am instructed by that committee to call the resolution up at this time for the purpose of agreeing to the Senate amendment. I have followed precedent and cleared through the majority leader and the minority leader.

I therefore move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MICHENER moves that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield me 5 minutes after he has completed his statement?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes; if the gentleman desires to be heard.

Mr. McCORMACK. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, this matter was thoroughly discussed in the House when House Joint Resolution 27 was before us for consideration. Adequate study was given by the Senate committee to the House bill and, with amendments, it was reported to the floor of the Senate where extensive debate was indulged in. After that debate the Senate amendment, now contained in the bill, was adopted.

What the Senate amendment does is best explained by reading the amendment:

No person shall be elected to the office of President more than twice.

That is clear, two terms of 4 years each.

And no person who has held the office of President or acted as President for more than 2 years of a term to which some other person was elected President shall be elected to the office of President more than once.

That is the material change. There is a change in language and a change in context. Under the Senate amendment it is possible for a President to serve two full terms, to be elected twice, regardless of any other service which he might have had as President, provided he shall only be elected once if he has served more than 2 years of another or a third term. The possibility therefore is that a President may conceivably, under this amendment, serve not to exceed 10 years.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. That would not apply to the present President, Mr. Truman, if he were reelected, would it?

Mr. MICHENER. No; I can answer that it does not apply to the present occupant of the White House, who is serving as President by virtue of having been elected as Vice President and the death of the President. It would in no way affect the present occupant of the office.

Mr. RANKIN. In other words, if President Truman were reelected in 1948 and again in 1952, he could serve out those terms.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALTER. What the gentleman has stated is correct, but not insofar as the language he has just read is concerned. The following language is designed to meet the situation described by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. MICHENER. As to the present incumbent of the office, yes.

Mr. WALTER. As to the present incumbent of the office.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman is quite correct. I intended to read all the language in the amendment. I may say that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER] is a very able member of the Judiciary Committee and, together with the committee, gave very close attention to this amendment since it was promulgated by the Senate.

Personally, I prefer—and I think most if not all members of the House Judiciary Committee prefer—the language adopted by the House. To me that language is more concise and understandable. There are no useless words. It is not pregnant with questions.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MICHENER. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. As one Member who voted for the resolution when it passed the House, I wish to say to the gentleman from Michigan that I prefer the language of the Senate amendment.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. I yield.

Mr. WALTER. Was not this language inserted in the Senate bill in order to avoid the possibility of anyone's pointing their finger at the present occupant of the White House?

Mr. MICHENER. That was the purpose, and it was stated in debate in the Senate that this was not an action in personam.

Mr. CAMP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. CAMP. I think I misunderstood the gentleman's statement a moment ago. Is it not possible—not speaking of the present occupant of the office—for some President to serve 10 years?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes; I thought I so stated. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. CAMP. I think the gentleman said eight. I just wanted it corrected.

Mr. MICHENER. If I did, I was wrong; two whole terms and not to exceed two additional years or 10 years.

Mr. CAMP. That is right.

Mr. MICHENER. It would be conceivable that a President might serve 10 years. That could happen. I believe when we legislate, we should always think of the possibilities and not the probabilities. The probabilities are that this amendment of the Senate would provide two terms of 4 years each for any one man, with the possibility just alluded to. The important thing is a definite limitation of terms.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I am sorry, I did not hear all of the gentleman's discussion and he may have answered this. As I understand, under the proposed amendment, as far as the present incumbent of the Presidency is concerned, he will be entitled to be a candidate to the Presidency two full terms.

Mr. MICHENER. Yes.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. It would not apply in the future to any other Vice President who succeeds to the presidency.

Mr. MICHENER. In the future, my understanding is that but two terms of 4 years each are contemplated. This language in the Senate amendment is rather complicated but it is the considered conclusion of the Senate.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Let us see about that now. The gentleman says 10 years. Suppose a President and Vice President are elected for 4 years, and the President should die within 1 year. If that Vice President would come in and serve 3 years as President, then would he be entitled to two terms after that?

Mr. MICHENER. No.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Then why is a special exception made to this one incumbent, and if so, how then in the future could anybody be elected for more than two terms?

Mr. MICHENER. The first part of the amendment says:

No person shall be elected to the office of President more than twice—

And—

No person who has held the office of President or acted as President for more than 2 years of the term to which some other person was elected President shall be elected to the office of the President more than once.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. That is very clear then. What that means is this: If a man ascends to the Presidency from the Vice Presidency, and if he served more than 2 years, then he cannot qualify to be a candidate twice for the Presidency.

Mr. MICHENER. No; he cannot qualify twice.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Well, let us take my case. Suppose a man is elected President and another is elected Vice President, and the President dies within a month, and the Vice President succeeds him. Now, that Vice President cannot be elected but once, because he served more than 2 years in that term.

Mr. MICHENER. That is correct, and that is the way it is intended to be.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Here is what the amendment means then. Any man who succeeds to the office after the President has served 2 years, in other words, succeeds so that he will serve less than 2 years, can be a candidate twice, but if he ascends to the Presidency within 2 years after he has been made Vice President he cannot be a candidate for the Presidency but once.

Mr. MICHENER. I said in the beginning that I considered this language more complicated than the House language. If the gentleman will read the debates on this matter in the Senate he will see that there was a difference of opinion. The gentleman's interpretation is correct. Of course, this limitation of one term would apply to any other person, like the Secretary of State, who executed the office of President more than 2 years after the beginning of anyone else's 4-year term.

If the Senate amendment to House Joint Resolution 27 is concurred in at this time, that ends the consideration of the resolution by the Congress. Two-thirds of the House and the Senate having voted in favor of the resolution, it then goes to the legislatures of the several States for ratification or rejection.

Usually legislation passing the House and the Senate contains some elements of compromise. That is natural because the 531 Members of the Congress do not always think exactly alike, especially when details are involved. So it is in the case before us. More than two-thirds of each House is agreed that the people should be permitted to vote on limiting the term which a President of the United States may serve. There is difference among those two-thirds as to the length of that term. There is difference as to the best language to be used in a constitutional amendment. Those differences have not been composed in precise accordance with the views of any individual in the Congress. There is some language I would like to change. I could select a term of limitation more agreeable to me than that contained in the resolution. However, this is the composite view of the people's representatives in Congress, and I hope that my motion will prevail, that this Senate amendment will be agreed to, and that the State legislatures will be advised at once and permitted to pass on this important question in their respective current sessions.

Here today, we are only giving the people back home the right to say what they want. Three-fourths of the States must join two-thirds of the Congress in an affirmative vote before the Constitution can be admended. I believe the States will act speedily.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK].

Mr. MCCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, the present legislative situation or legislative status of this proposed amendment to the Constitution is such that naturally there is no opposition, as far as I know, certainly not on my part, to the motion made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER].

However, I want the RECORD to show that because there is no opposition at this legislative stage that does not mean that Members, like myself, vigorously oppose the passage of this legislation to amend the Constitution; and we hope that when it goes to the several legislatures that they will give profound consideration, as I am sure they will, to the serious implications involved if this amendment becomes a part of the organic law of our country.

During the debate when this resolution was before the House I said that putting this into the Constitution will tie the hands of future generations of Americans; that what we are doing today is not legislating for ourselves from a constitutional angle, but acting in a manner that will be binding upon future generations of Americans after we are dead and gone. Some time in the future, if our country is engaged in a war and our back is to the wall, and a future generation has a President whose second term is drawing to an end, this very amendment could produce a condition that might place future generations of Americans in a strait-jacket and seriously imperil the continued existence of our country.

I recognize that men have honest views both ways on this matter. I respect the views of those who are advocates of a two-term restriction, but I am very deeply concerned about the operation of this amendment if it becomes a part of the Constitution. The chances are that I will not be here and nobody in this body will be here when that occasion arises in the future, if it should. We will all have taken the journey by that time, in all probability. I hope no future generation of Americans will be faced with the problem, but we cannot eliminate the possibility that war will visit our country again in the future after we are dead and gone; and if it does, and if there is a good President in office leading our people at that time, and his second term is drawing to a close, this very amendment will have a serious and adverse effect upon the people of America and upon the very institutions of government in which we believe.

I emphasize this for whatever value it may have to the members of the several legislatures when this amendment comes before them on the question of ratification. This is a question they cannot escape. It is a question no thinking legislator in this Congress can just brush aside by saying we are referring it to the legislatures. When it gets to the members of the legislatures, they have their responsibility to pass upon the question. I passed upon it when the matter was in the House before and I am passing upon it now. I am very much disturbed about the inflexibility of this amendment in binding Americans of tomorrow and preventing them from exercising a flexible judgment in meeting an emergency or an acute situation that may confront them after you and I are dead and gone.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. THOMASON. We hear a lot of talk these days about World War III, which we all hope and pray will never happen. Is it not a fact that if that sad day should ever come and some great man is President of this country, regardless of his political faith, and we are right in the middle of a terrible war where probably the result is in doubt, and three-fourths of the American States have adopted this amendment, we would be thrown into the throes of a great political contest and under no conditions could that man be reelected? That is the truth, is it not? I contend you can always trust the people and I am against this conference report.

Mr. McCORMACK. Undoubtedly. It is because of my disturbed state of mind, not in opposition to the action taken now, although I do not favor it, that I wanted the record to show that there was a voice raised at this stage of the legislative proceedings pointing out the danger that lies in the ultimate ratification of this amendment by three-fourths of the legislatures of the Union.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I am sure the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] is very sincere and conscientious, as he always is, and he has made his usual good argument. He made this same argument when this resolution was considered by the House before it was voted on. The House passed this resolution by a vote of 285 for, and only 121 against. That resolution limited a President to not more than 8 years, or two terms, under any circumstances. There was a possibility that a Vice President might serve only one term of 4 years and a minor fraction of a second term.

The gentleman is quite right that all this resolution does is submit this question to the people, to the States, for their determination. The passage of this resolution is not binding until three-fourths of the States have affirmatively said that that is what they want. I have always felt that the people can be trusted when they are advised. The people back home know whether they want to limit the term of a President. They can and will vote intelligently, because the proposal has been debated for years.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. I would like to make the observation at this time that the debate on this amendment in both bodies was of a very high character, and confining myself to commenting on the action in the House, the debate by Members on both sides of the aisle was on such a very high level I believe all of us can feel proud of it.

Mr. MICHENER. Yes; the manner of approach has been in the right spirit. I was especially impressed with what the gentleman said when he took the floor a moment ago and expressed his views, but made it clear to the House that the majority of the House and the other body having acted, he was not in opposition to the action contemplated by my motion.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I am taking this time because I do not want the impression to go out that Members on our side of the House do not want the legislatures of the various States to ratify this amendment.

Remember, this amendment would not prevent President Truman from succeeding himself in 1948 and 1952.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] talks about a contingency that may arise generations from now. My answer is that the Constitution can be amended at any time.

Talk about limitations on future generations—why, some of the greatest blessings we have ever enjoyed are found in the strict limitations placed in the Constitution by the founding fathers.

Talk about a condition arising in time of war? That has happened twice. During the War Between the States you had a Presidential election in 1864, right in the heat of the conflict.

They talk about a President passing away or leaving office in time of war. We had that happen in this war. Has it occurred to you that we changed Presidents before the war closed with either Germany or Japan?

Remember, it was Harry Truman who ordered the use of the atomic bomb that really ended the war with Japan.

Mr. Speaker, there is only one change I would like to see made. I am sorry the Senate did not provide that a man who had succeeded to the Presidency from the Vice Presidency would be eligible to two successive terms. But they did not see fit to do that, and we must vote for or against this amendment. However, they did so provide as to the present occupant of the White House.

In my opinion, the overwhelming majority of the legislatures of the various States will approve this amendment.

I call attention again to the fact that in 1861, when we knew we were going into a war and when our President of the Confederacy had already been selected, the Constitutional Convention of the Confederate States—which was composed of the best minds in the whole country—put a limitation of 6 years in their Constitution. No President, no matter how long the war might have lasted, could have served more than 6 years. Mr. Davis himself agreed to that limitation.

A great many Members wanted to put that limitation in this amendment. I thought it was best to limit it to two 4-year terms. But I do think the Senate acted wisely in providing that this limitation shall not prevent the present incumbent from succeeding himself in 1948 and in 1952; and also providing that any future President who has not served more than 2 years of a term to which he has succeeded may be a candidate for reelection at the two succeeding elections. I am sorry they did not leave it, as I said, so that a man who has succeeded to the Presidency would be eligible to two successive terms.

But, taking it all in all, I think this amendment should be adopted, and I believe it will be approved by an overwhelming majority of the legislatures of the various States.

As for this matter of putting the people of the future in a strait-jacket, it does not do that; because, as I said, they have a right to change the Constitution at any time.

Mr. FOLGER. Mr. Speaker, I was and am opposed to the bill to amend the Constitution so as to limit terms of President to two terms. I think the amendment made by the other body improves the original bill somewhat; this does not, however, change my attitude in opposition to the measure.

This subject was fully discussed by the framers of our Constitution, and in their combined judgment it was deemed unwise to limit the terms of a President to two. Situations and conditions can arise that would make it undesirable and contrary to the wishes of our people that such a limitation become a part of the organic law of the Nation. Recent occurrences confirm, in my mind, the danger of such a limitation. After all, it is a matter for the people and should remain so. One, to be elected one time or two times or three, must receive the nomination, and he must receive a majority of the votes of the people. To impress this two-term limitation or prohibition would deny the right or privilege of the people to have established their wishes and judgment that might be exercised in a case of emergency.

There is not even a fanciful danger that a third or fourth term will occur except under extreme circumstances. By the passage of this bill or resolution we do not escape our responsibility by saying that the matter is left to the States for their determination. The very passage of the bill or resolution is more than the granting of a privilege that the States vote on the question, but it is essentially an invitation to the States to do so. It would not be imagined that the Congress would adopt a resolution of this character unless it were the desire of Congress that it be accepted. What we do is to substantially place our approval upon this constitutional inhibition.

We, no doubt, will not again find it necessary to elect one to a third term or a fourth. What we propose to do is to deny to our posterity the privilege to protect themselves, if they will, from an apparent or certain hazard, which would occur through the removal of one the people desire to be President at a time that, in their opinion, might well result in a great danger to the Nation.

I just desire that any, in posterity, who may have occasion to wonder what my position is on this important subject may find it in the RECORD: That I am opposed to this legislation.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, House Joint Resolution 27, which relates to the Presidential tenure in office, came before Subcommittee No. 4 of the Judiciary Committee, of which I am the chairman, and we gave this matter very careful consideration, which resulted in the reporting of the resolution which was then considered by the full Judiciary Committee, reported favorably, and which was then presented to the House and passed by the House by a rather large majority over the required two-thirds vote. This measure then went to the other body, and certain amendments have been adopted written into this resolution. While I far prefer the measure which was adopted by the House, and I prefer the language which was contained therein to that which is now contained in the amendment adopted by the other body, but in order to finally determine this subject and to fix a definite policy relating to the tenure of the office of our President, I am willing to yield to the amendments. This policy, if finally adopted, will be very helpful to both the people and any person aspiring to become President of this great Nation, I am confident.

Mr. Speaker, all of the Members are aware that the import of the pending resolution is that it merely seeks the authority to submit this question to the various State legislatures, and if three-fourths of the States, by and through their State legislatures, approve this policy of fixing the tenure of the office of our Chief Executive, then this joint resolution will become effective. Otherwise, it will have no force and effect. All will note that the additional amendment is incorporated in this resolution, by amendment adopted in the other body, that the provisions of the pending joint resolution does not apply to the present incumbent of the office of President.

The mere authority being granted in this joint resolution for the people, by and through their State legislatures, to pass upon the provisions contained therein is certainly a sound and constructive policy. I, as one Member, desire that the people have the full right and power, through their State legislatures, to determine this policy. All those who oppose this joint resolution, when the final vote is taken, will be in effect saying that they do not desire that the people, through the recognized processes of submitting this important subject to their State legislatures, have any voice in determining this question. What we need in this country is a little closer contact with the people, and to permit the people to participate in the functions of government, and the policies of government. This is one instance wherein the people should have the opportunity of expressing their views upon the policy of fixing the tenure of the office of President. Many of our Presidents have expressed their views upon this subject. Their expressed opinions should be carefully considered. The debates in the Constitutional Convention, upon this very question, lend much support to the fair and reasonable limitation fixed by the pending joint resolution.

Mr. Speaker, it is my hope that the House will accept the amendments adopted in the Senate, thereby finally concluding this measure insofar as this legislative body is concerned. It is also my fervent hope that every State legislature will give this joint resolution very careful consideration, and, after consulting with the people generally, take such action thereon as is just and proper. The reasons mentioned today of fear for our future if this joint resolution is passed are, I am constrained to believe, groundless. In the last war, before it ended, we changed Presidents. In the Civil War, a kindred situation developed. It is unthinkable for us to believe that there are no craftsmen who are able to take the place of any man in any office or position. The people recognize that there are many—yes, many—who are able to assume the work of any person, in any position, at any time. I, therefore, hope this question may be concluded today by the acceptance of the amendments, and that this question may be submitted to the State legislatures for approval or rejection, as they may determine.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, the splendid argument made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] was most convincing and this legislation, I fear, may come to plague us if the legislatures of two-thirds of the States should approve, which I hope they will not. It has been stated that while favorable action has been taken by Congress it does not mean that the various State legislatures would follow the action of Congress. However, I venture to say that in many of the States it will be felt that in view that Congress has acted that the legislatures should not deny favorable action on the amendment. Personally I would have preferred that instead of leaving the matter to the legislatures that we would have provided for conventions so that the real viewpoint of the people of the respective States would control.

I cannot quite understand why the majority feel the need of changing the Constitution which has stood us so well for 160 years. It is my opinion that only an extraordinary man, one of great ability, and one who had the interest of the country at heart, could be urged to run and be reelected to a third and fourth Presidential term, as was President Franklin D. Roosevelt. It is certain that a weak man who did not enjoy the confidence of the people could not be reelected to a third or fourth term. Consequently, I voted against the original bill and shall vote against the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. THOMASON) there were—ayes 81, noes 29.

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of order.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the Senate amendments were concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who so desire may be permitted to extend their own remarks in the RECORD preceding the vote on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR AND THE FEDERAL SECURITY AGENCY APPROPRIATION BILL, 1948

Mr. KEEFE, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 2700, Rept. No. 178) making appropriations for the Department of Labor, the Federal Security Agency, and related independent agencies, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1948, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. RAYBURN reserved all points of order on the bill.

CONTROL AND ERADICATION OF FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE AND RINDERPEST

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Joint Resolution 154, making appropriations for expenses incident to the control and eradication of the foot-and-mouth disease and rinderpest, and ask unanimous consent that the same be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER]?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for expenses necessary to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to control and eradicate foot-and-mouth disease and rinderpest as authorized by the act of February 28, 1947 (Public Law 8), and the act of May 29, 1884, as amended by the act of September 21, 1944 (21 U. S. C. 114a), fiscal year 1947, $9,000,000, to be available for the purposes of carrying out the provisions of said Public Law 8 until June 30, 1948.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, there is a foot-and-mouth disease outbreak amongst cattle in Mexico, and it is spreading very rapidly. The Mexican Government has agreed to put in about $9,350,000. We have been authorized to move into the picture by the Gillie bill, Public Law No. 8, which was passed a short time ago. The Department of Agriculture is ready to step in. At the present time Mexico has 25,000 troops keeping a quarantine on these cattle.

These foot-and-mouth disease outbreaks are very expensive and are very difficult to handle. Unless we move in rapidly, it is going to be disastrous to our entire livestock industry all over the North American Continent.

What bothers me about it is that the program of the Department of Agriculture is so slow. They propose only to kill 2,000 animals a day, whereas I believe they should equip themselves to take care of 20,000 and get it cleaned up immediately before it spreads any farther.

I do not feel that the Appropriations Committee on the House of Representatives should take a chance on having any responsibility placed on their shoulders for failure to meet this situation.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. THOMASON. Coming as I do from the Mexican border and being more or less familiar with the seriousness of the situation in Mexico, I would like to commend the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations for this prompt action. The situation is not only serious. It is very alarming. I think perhaps they are beginning to make some headway to get it under control. Time is of the essence, and I urge prompt and effective action to stamp out this dread disease.

Mr. TABER. The Department of Agriculture is moving too slow.

Mr. THOMASON. Yes; I agree with that. I hope this will be the means of speeding it up. I agree in what the gentleman said about the slowness of the program but I think that was largely because they have not had enough money to proceed with the full program.

Mr. TABER. They did not ask for the money until yesterday, and we are giving our approval today.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I simply wish to make the point that the committee acted immediately after the Department brought the request for the funds and reported the bill out on the very next day.

Mr. THOMASON. We from the cattle country are very happy at the promptness with which the committee acted. I hope the Department of Agriculture will follow your fine example.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. The legislative act requires 30-day reports from the Secretary of Agriculture. I am merely suggesting that the Members, especially the committee and those from the cattle areas, should interest themselves personally in those reports to see that action comes from the Secretary on this foot-and-mouth-disease problem.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may require to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GILLIE].

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, House Joint Resolution 154 provides for an appropriation of $9,000,000 for use in carrying out the joint United States-Mexican program for exterminating foot-and-mouth disease in the Republic of Mexico through June 30, 1947.

Inasmuch as both the House and Senate unanimously approved American participation in this important program less than a month ago, there should be no opposition to the appropriation of this comparatively modest sum.

I am pleased to report that rapid progress in formulating an effective campaign against foot-and-mouth disease in Mexico has been made in recent weeks by officials of the two governments.

Meeting in Washington, officials representing Mexican agriculture and the United States Department of Agriculture have made a careful estimate of expenses incurred by the Mexican Government since the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in Mexico, and probable expenses through June 30, 1947, of both Governments in order to carry out an effective campaign.

It was my pleasure to meet with these officials last week and have them as my guests at the Capitol. Many of you met them at that time. They included the Honorable Oscar Flores, Mexican Under Secretary of Animal Industry; Ignacio de la Torre, representing the Ministry of Agriculture and Animal Industry of Mexico, and Adolfo Alarcon, Agricultural Attaché of the Mexican Embassy.

Representing the American Government in conference with these gentlemen were W. V. Lambert, Administrator of the Agricultural Research Administration; Dr. B. T. Simms, Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry; and John A. Hopkins, of the Office of Foreign Agricultural Relations.

The following findings and recommendations resulted from these conferences:

Whereas Mexico is incurring expenses for services, personnel, equipment, and supplies which are estimated to amount to $7,600,000 up to June 30, and will be responsible for indemnities to be paid for slaughter of hogs, goats, and sheep, which will amount to a sum of approximately $1,750,000, making a total Mexican contribution of $9,350,000 for this period.

It is recommended: 1. That the United States contribution for this period should consist of expenses for equipment, supplies, personnel, and so forth, amounting to approximately $1,500,000, plus indemnities of $7,500,000 for cattle slaughtered, making a total of $9,000,000.

2. That any salvage recovered by Mexico from animals slaughtered during the campaign should be used in the joint campaign in addition to the services already rendered by Mexico, and, with regard to the continuation of the joint program for the eradication of foot-and-mouth disease in Mexico after July 1, 1947.

Whereas Mexico hopes to continue its expenditures at approximately the same rate as during the months April–June 1947, but foresees that it will not be able to increase this rate of expenditure,

It is further recommended: 1. That, if a fully effective program of eradication is to be carried on during the succeeding 12 months, the United States Government be prepared to increase its rate of expenditures, the amount of such increase to be dependent on the total expenditures necessary for the period from July 1, 1947, to June 30, 1948.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, the two appalling features of this disease are first, its incurability, and second, the alarming rapidity with which it is disseminated.

The only remedy is extermination. All infected animals, or animals exposed to infection, must be slaughtered promptly and either incinerated or buried at least 7 feet deep and beyond all possibility of disinterment.

It spreads with such rapidity, carried by men, dogs, and birds, that if allowed to take its course, it would within a short time eliminate the livestock industry. It first appeared in Mexico in December and although quarantined and opposed by every resource of the Mexican Government, it is now distributed through 10 Mexican States and already has traveled a distance of 250 miles.

The disease is not restricted to cattle but affects all cloven-footen animals, including goats, deer, sheep, and hogs. Its impact upon the livestock of the country is as deadly as an outbreak of smallpox among primitive nomadic tribes in the last century, and unless controlled would eventually wipe out a large part of the animal life of North America.

Some scientists have advanced the idea that the possibility of the incidence of some such disease may explain the mysterious disappearance of prehistoric animals, such as the dinosaur, the largest animal of all time, which roamed through the length and breadth of North America in countless numbers during the Cretaceous period and then became extinct although there was no form of animal life on the globe at the time which could have brought about its extinction.

Although the Mexican Government has deployed an army of 25,000 men about the infected area and is making every effort to restrict and exterminate it, the problem is of such serious proportions, and the disease is advancing so rapidly toward our own borders that it is necessary for us to cooperate at once. Frankly, the $9,000,000 carried in the pending bill will not be sufficient to see us through. But it is all that can be utilized at this time and will carry on the work until further funds can be provided.

The report accompanying the resolution is somewhat misleading in that it may serve to give the impression that the Department of Agriculture has not moved with sufficient celerity and is not attacking the problem with sufficient emphasis.

Quite the contrary is true. The news of the outbreak, with the suggestion that the contagion might be the dreaded foot-and-mouth disease, reached the Department one afternoon. Early the next morning a plane was dispatched with American scientists to the scene of the outbreak. The telegram announcing that the diagnosis was unmistakable was received at the Department at 5 o'clock p. m. and at 5:30 o'clock telegrams were dispatched alerting all stations and closing the Mexican border to importations of susceptible animals and taking every other step warranted by the situation.

The delay intervening between that time and this was due to the necessity of the Mexican authorities completing their plans and securing authorization for negotiations. The representatives of the Mexican Government with final authority to act reached Washington Saturday and the American Department of Agriculture promptly concluded arrangements and forwarded a budget estimate through regular channels to the House on Monday. In the meantime materials had been located, contracts prepared and every action taken that could be taken in advance of concordance with the Mexican Government and appropriation by the Congress.

I congratulate the Department and those in charge of this work for the aggressive and efficient way in which they have met the situation. It could not have been more ably or more expeditiously handled.

It has been suggested that the rate of slaughter of 2,000 head of cattle a day is too low and indicates either lack of appreciation of the situation or failure to meet it with all available resources. On the contrary, the processing and slaughter of 2,000 head per day is the limit of physical capacity—especially in the early days of the campaign. The process of acquisition, indemnification, and eradication, with all the attending difficulties of salvage of exposed but uninfected animals over so wide and broken a terrain presents obstacles insurmountable at a greater rate of speed, while the cooperation of owners, processors, and officials is being enlisted and a routine established.

As a matter of fact the Committee on Appropriations has acted only and solely on the advice and suggestion of the Department. The amount of the $9,000,000 appropriation itself was determined by the Department and not by the committee, which merely approved it.

But time is short and the committee is to be commended for the promptness with which it has cooperated. I trust the House will likewise cooperate with a unanimous vote on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ROBSION asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include therein a letter from Mr. Ernest T. Weir, president of the Weirton Steel Co., Pittsburgh, Pa.

DISTRIBUTION AND PRICING OF SUGAR

Mr. KUNKEL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 146, to extend the powers and authorities under certain statutes with respect to the distribution and pricing of sugar, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 146, relating to the distribution and pricing of sugar, with Mr. COLE of New York in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I think that the purposes of House Joint Resolution 146, which is before us for consideration, quite generally meet the approval of the House. The Committee on Banking and Currency held rather extensive hearings and debated it quite at length, and it was reported out of the committee unanimously with the reservation, as is usual, that the committee members might take any position they cared to on the floor with respect to amendments or the final disposition of the resolution.

The resolution, in substance, provides for the continuance of the sugar rationing and the pricing of sugar until October 31, 1947, with the provision that the Secretary of Agriculture is granted the authority to continue inventory controls between October 31, 1947 and March 31, 1948, when, under the provisions of the resolution, all controls over the rationing of sugar shall expire.

It will be recalled that the authority to ration sugar is contained in the Second War Powers Act which, unless it is extended by the Congress, expires on March 31, 1947, and the power to control prices of sugar is found in the Emergency Price Control and Stabilization Acts. That authority, unless the Congress moves to continue it, expires on June 30, 1947.

In this bill we seek to dispose of both of the questions of rationing and of pricing, and the controls in this resolution are set up separately and independently of any other powers and machinery provided for in the Second War Powers Act and the Emergency Price Control and Rationing Acts. It is contemplated that the Office of Price Administration shall be discontinued as such on or before June 30, 1947. The powers to ration sugar and control the price of sugar is continued under the provisions of this resolution under the jurisdiction and control of the Secretary of Agriculture. Provision is made for the transfer of appropriations and personnel, but the policy making will henceforth be in the Department of Agriculture.

Now, the need for the legislation is quite generally accepted and I think quite apparent. I think you get a great deal of detailed information from the report of the committee.

Mr. TALLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. TALLE. An important correction should be made in the report on page 10. The reason for the correction is a typographical error. I should like to read the last sentence of the conclusion as it should appear in the report:

> It feels that with the increased sugar available during 1947, over 1946, for industrial users that the reasonable needs of new users and the reasonable relief of hardship cases including provision of sugar to prevent the wastage of milk—
>
> Not mill—
> and other food products, must be provided for by the Secretary of Agriculture.

It was the will of the committee that this direction should be given to the Secretary of Agriculture in order that the wastage of milk, which has already occurred and which would increase in the future, might be stopped.

The preservation of food is certainly very important. I call the attention of my colleagues to page 162 of the hearings, where Mr. Holman, Secretary of the National Cooperative Milk Producers Federation, summarized the situation and expressed his deep interest in this matter.

Said Mr. Holman:

> Large amounts of skim milk will go to waste or be lost for human consumption unless sugar is made available to process it. The Government agencies have indicated that they will not make the necessary sugar available unless they are compelled to do so by Congress.

The committee, therefore, agreed to make the intent of the resolution now before us clear by putting into the report the language which I have read in its correct form.

I shall not take any further time. I believe my very able and distinguished chairman will support me in what I have said.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The gentleman is absolutely correct. It is a typographical error, where the word "mill" appears in the line quoted by the gentleman from Iowa. It should be "milk."

I may say that the intent of the committee in that respect is further set forth in the language on page 12 of the report, which reads as follows:

> It is the intention of the committee that the Secretary of Agriculture, in carrying out this provision—
>
> As respects new users, users who did not have a base period, and hardship cases—
> shall make just and reasonable provision for meeting the need for sugar in hardship cases (including cases where sugar is needed to avoid wastage of milk or other food products) and for the needs of new sugar users, and the needs of those who have no base-period history. It is provided that the Secretary shall act without regard to other law, because it is believed that he should not be bound by the provisions of title II of the War Mobilization and Reconversion Act of 1944.

That was put in because of the Moberly against Anderson & Fleming case, with which you are all familiar.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Getting back to the hardship cases, I know definitely that in the past the Department has discriminated against people where there is a change or transfer of ownership. I know of one case where there were two competitors. One of them sold his business to an individual, and that new individual was denied the same rights as his competitor because there was this transfer in ownership. I wonder if the gentleman would be so kind as to tell the House whether it is not the intent of this bill that there shall be no discrimination where there is a transfer in ownership, providing the person who purchases it continues the same line of business and the same use of sugar.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself five additional minutes.

In answer to the gentleman I may say that there should be no question in respect to those cases where the purchaser of the property is a veteran. It has always been customary for them to take care of the veterans in that particular.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I mean irrespective of veterans. I am talking of someone who is not a veteran.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I have a letter here on that subject from Mr. Irvin L. Rice, Acting Deputy Commissioner for Sugar, Sugar Department, Office of Temporary Controls, and I shall include this as part of my remarks. It is as follows:

OFFICE OF TEMPORARY CONTROLS,
Washington, D. C.

The Honorable JESSE P. WOLCOTT,
Chairman, House Banking and Currency Committee, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WOLCOTT: You have requested further information as to the right of a purchaser of a going sugar-using business to receive the sugar allotment of that business under the sugar-rationing programs in line with testimony given before your committee last week by Mr. George Dice. Since Mr. Dice is no longer with this office, I have undertaken to supply the information you request.

Section 18.3 of Third Revised Ration Order 3 is the section which governs the transfer of sugar bases and allotments when the transferor disposes of all or part of his sugar-using operations. A transfer to the purchaser of a proportionate part or all of the sugar base of the business will be made if both transferor and transferee notify the appropriate sugar branch office of the sale of the business, and if the transferee will continue to serve the same area, and the same class of customers, with the same class of products as were formerly produced by the transferor. These requirements are, of course, designed to permit the normal consumer of the products of the business the opportunity to continue to receive them.

The transferee need not continue to use the same premises and facilities for his operation as were formerly used by the transferor. From our standpoint all that is necessary to be transferred are the assets of the particular establishment which go to the make-up of that establishment as a going concern. These assets include, of course, the good will, lists of customers or routes, and things of a like nature which are essential to the continued operation of the business by the transferee.

I should like to point out that, in the case of veterans' sugar bases assigned under Revised General Ration Order 18, the rule is somewhat different. In such cases, the transfer of the sugar base is permissible within a year after the establishment has begun to operate only if the transferee is himself a qualified veteran or if he acquires the business by inheritance on the death of the veteran owner of the establishment. However, after the establishment has been in operation for more than a year it may be transferred to any person under the provisions of Third Revised Ration Order 3 mentioned above. The purpose of this 1-year limitation upon transferability of veterans' sugar bases is to prevent the fraudulent use of veterans by established users or otherwise ineligible persons as mere devices for obtaining sugar bases or additions to their established bases.

I trust this supplies the information you desire. If I can be of further assistance, do not hesitate to call upon me.

Sincerely yours,

IRVIN L. RICE,
Acting Deputy Commissioner for Sugar Department.

In accordance with this letter, the purchaser of the business is subrogated to all the rights of the person from whom the business was purchased had, if he carries on the same business. If he indulges in new practices, if he expands the business and goes into the manufacture or processing of new products, then he becomes a new user and would be considered under the other provisions of the law; but if he carries on the same business, producing the same article, he gets all the rights the person from whom he bought had.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. OWENS. I was listening very carefully but I still cannot understand clearly what the gentleman means by new users. I looked at the report and also the hearings, and I have not been able up to this time to inform myself clearly as to what is meant by new users.

Mr. WOLCOTT. It does not make very much difference. If they are not classified as new users, then they are probably being taken care of at the present time, and if they are classified as new users, whether by reason of expansion of existing business or by having just gone into business, then it is our intention that the Secretary of Agriculture shall make provision for such users consistent with the over-all program. But our intent very clearly is that the Secretary of Agriculture shall make available some sugar for new users. We have deplored the fact that there is a possibility under the practice which has heretofore been indulged in of freezing such an important segment of our economy as to put the Congress in the position where by legislation it not only condones but almost participates in violations of the spirit, at least, of the Sherman Antitrust Act. We wish to avoid this in the pending legislation.

Mr. OWENS. But I do not think the point is made clear enough with reference to those who have struggled through the years regarding sugar as to whether or not it is going to affect them. I agree with the gentleman but I do not believe it is made clear enough.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I think it might affect them somewhat. It will affect them this way. An existing business anticipates an expansion predicated upon an increase in availability of sugar which will give it an increase in its allotment. If we make provisions for new users, that must, of course, come out of any increases which the old users would otherwise get.

Mr. OWENS. I do not see how you can justify continuing the rationing of sugar in that way and permit new users who come into the market to get an increase in sugar.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Would you be against the rationing of sugar to new users?

Mr. OWENS. No, but all I am saying is that it is not explained sufficiently.

Mr. WOLCOTT. May I say that the only alternative would be to set aside a certain percentage of sugar to new users. It is difficult to determine what percentage should be granted to new users or left to the old users. You have to leave the administration of this law to someone. You cannot legislate common sense into the administration of any law. But if common sense is not used in the administration of a law, then, of course, the Congress is always here to check against it and to make provisions to correct any abuses. All of the extension bills for OPA which we have ever had before the Congress have been predicated upon faulty administration, at least, by the Office of Price Administration. It is hoped by transferring the administration of this law to the Secretary of Agriculture the whole economy will get somewhat more sympathetic consideration.

Mr. OWENS. I agree with the gentleman, but I still feel that it is giving dictatorial powers to one man without clearly defining them.

Mr. TALLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield.

Mr. TALLE. Supplementing what my chairman has said about transfers of titles to plants and whether a sugar quota passes with the title to the buyer, I may say that I interrogated Mr. Dice on that very matter, and the colloquy may be found on pages 112 and 113 of the printed hearings pertaining to the pending resolution.

Mr. WOLCOTT. May I go on and put these figures in the RECORD justifying this continuance and state very briefly what we may expect the picture to be this year.

I think the sugar situation is getting very, very much better. In 1945, we had available to the United States for all purposes 5,085,908 short tons. In 1946, we had available 5,479,529 short tons, and it is estimated in 1947 we shall have available 6,800,000 short tons. These figures are in terms of raw sugar values. That is quite an increase, and there is a possibility of our getting even more sugar if the Cuban sugar crop comes up to latest expectations. So, I think we can be assured that by the latter part of this year the supply is reasonably going to approach demands.

We are assured that there is going to be almost enough to give the American people on a per capita basis within 10 pounds per annum of normal consumption. The normal consumption by the people of the United States is about 103 pounds raw value. We are assured that this year the American people on a per capita basis will get about 93 pounds raw value. One pound of refined sugar equals 1.07 pounds raw value.

So we are approaching that period, if we use judgment, when it will be perfectly safe without injury to the housewife and without injury to the commercial or industrial user, to take controls off altogether.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. This bill keeps the Government controls until October 31 of this year. Are the people of the United States to understand that at that time Government controls will cease?

Mr. WOLCOTT. That is the recommendation of the committee, excepting that inventory controls may be continued until March 31, 1948.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman explain what he means by "inventory controls?"

Mr. WOLCOTT. I cannot. It would seem to me that something has to be done with it. I am so far protecting the committee bill. The committee in its judgment accepted that. I would have preferred to handle it otherwise. I am just a little fearful that unless we do something with that language, it will be assumed that we have continued the power of the Secretary of Agriculture to continue sugar rationing until March 31, because we do not say that only commercial inventories shall be continued. We say "inventories." Of course, that might include sugar which the housewives may have in the sugar bowls. I will later offer an amendment to clarify our intentions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT] has again expired.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself one additional minute.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, where an old-established firm, using a certain amount of sugar, buys another firm that is run down at the heel, and they wish to build up this company, not in its own city or even in its own State, and he comes down to Washington and asks assistance in getting a sugar allotment to take care of that business, is he going to receive the same kind of treatment after this bill is passed that he is receiving now from this group which you just got through saying we could not legislate any common sense in? I do not think they have any kind of sense—common or uncommon.

Mr. WOLCOTT. It is the hope of the committee that the administration of this law from this time on will be more sympathetic. But the answer to the problem is not to take off controls, because if you take off controls you would have the commercial bidding successfully in the open market, either with or without price control, for supplies with which to build up inventories. What I think we have to be very careful about here is that feature. I think we should generally have this in mind throughout these discussions, that what the committee has attempted to do and what the Congress should try to do is to prevent the creation of a situation where, by competition in the open market, the housewife will be prejudiced to the point where she will not be able to get any sugar.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has again expired.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, this was a unanimous report of the committee. That does not mean there were not some sharp differences of opinion as to what the bill should contain. Controls were the result of the war. I have heard some gentlemen speak of the controls as totalitarian, and they seem to draw no distinction between controls which a dictator places upon his people to enslave them and controls which a freely elected Congress places upon those who freely elected them, for their own good.

Controls during the great emergency of the war were absolutely essential to preserve the economy of our Nation. The taking off of those controls is liable to produce an issue as explosive as putting them on. This is no time to make controls a whipping boy, because if you do the result may be disastrous to those who take that action.

Nobody wants controls. I think all reasonable people want free enterprise and the competitive system. I would like to go back tomorrow to the conditions that prevailed long before that great emergency which the Democratic Party inherited years ago, and long before the war; but conditions make it imperative that we continue these controls. You all know the hazards of agriculture. Nobody can tell what the sugar crop will be this year. There was a wide diversity of opinion before the committee as to what sugar would be produced this year. There is a shortage of sugar. Sugar is the most generally demanded product in the world. There is a world demand. The alternative that presented itself to the committee under this bill was whether rationing would cease on the 31st day of March and price control would cease on the 30th of June. If no legislation is enacted, all controls would go off on the 30th of June of this year.

The bill as originally introduced provided that price control should cease on October 31, but the Secretary of Agriculture afterwards felt it was necessary and in the public interest to continue those controls until the 31st of March of next year. I thought that was a wise provision, for when controls go off under this bill Congress will not be in session. The controls will cease on the 31st of October.

I do not believe either the consumer or the producer wants a disorganized market. I do not believe either would profit by a runaway price of sugar. The producer, of course, might benefit for a short time, but in the long run it would be disastrous to both the producer and the consumer. I think there ought to be discretion somewhere when the date arrives on which these controls are removed to say whether or not it is advisble to remove them on that date. I am for the bill, of course, as compared with the present legislation. I believe the Secretary of Agriculture is the proper person in whom to lodge this discretion.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPENCE. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. As I understand, then, the bill does two things: First, it does away with OPA control over sugar.

Mr. SPENCE. Yes.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. And it reposes all controls in the Secretary of Agriculture until the 31st of October.

Mr. SPENCE. And transfers to the Secretary of Agriculture all existing machinery and available funds.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Until the 31st of October.

Mr. SPENCE. Until the 31st of October.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Is there any other provision of law under which the Secretary of Agriculture would have control after the 31st of October?

Mr. SPENCE. None that I know of.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. No rationing, no price control?

Mr. SPENCE. None that I know of except the control of inventories until the 31st of March. What inventory control means and how far that goes I do not know. I do not think it means ordinary price control or rationing.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. It would probably operate something like a floor-tax control. Anyhow, he has that discretion after the 31st of October?

Mr. SPENCE. Yes; after the 31st of October, but the control over rationing and price ceases abruptly.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Would the gentleman construe inventory control to go so far as to inventory the sugar in the hands of the consumer, for instance, the housewife?

Mr. SPENCE. No; I do not think so.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Would it go so far as to require inventory controls of sugar in the hands of little independent grocers or some small retailer?

Mr. SPENCE. I have no definition of inventory control, but I think it would be probably applied to large holders of sugar. I do not believe the Government will go into every kitchen to see what the housewife has on her shelves. I do not believe there is anything like that in contemplation.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Would the gentleman construe it to mean that it covers the large industrial users of sugar and the wholesalers?

Mr. SPENCE. It seems to me it will be limited. I cannot believe the Secretary of Agriculture would want to go into the kitchen of the housewife to see how much she has on hand.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SPENCE. Certainly.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. See if this expresses it correctly: As I understand sugar was the first commodity put under the control of OPA and it is the last one to be taken out from under control, and with the coming of October 31 all rationing of all commodities will go?

Mr. SPENCE. Yes. It was placed under control of OPA because of necessity and because of the shortage of supply. It is still controlled because of shortage of supply. The only hope is that the supply will equal the demand, for if it does not we will see a spiral rise in the price of sugar that will cost the housewife millions and millions of dollars.

Mr. BONNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPENCE. I yield.

Mr. BONNER. What is the purpose of inventory control if rationing and price controls go off? What is the advantage of it?

Mr. SPENCE. I suppose inventory control after rationing and price controls are removed would tend to prevent hoarding. Some people might hoard sugar for the purpose of selling it afterwards at a profit.

Mr. BONNER. Suppose that takes place. Then what can the Secretary of Agriculture do about it under this bill?

Mr. SPENCE. I do not know what he is going to do about it.

Mr. BONNER. That is why I am asking the question, What is the advantage of this inventory control?

Mr. SPENCE. It will tend to prevent hoarding of sugar.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has again expired.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 2 additional minutes.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPENCE. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I would like to ask the gentleman if this bill outlines any specific policy and directs the Secretary of Agriculture to do any specific thing as far as limiting the amount of rationing is concerned?

Mr. SPENCE. No; that is left to the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture under general powers. He has additional power that he did not have before to render decisions in hardship cases, which I think is a very wise plan.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Is it the opinion of the gentleman that the passage of this bill will keep the housewife in enough sugar, that is, as far as the policy goes, to continue her through October 31?

Mr. SPENCE. There will be no change in the administration until that time except that it is transferred to the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. The point I am trying to make is this: As I understand, the passage of this bill is to avoid chaos and confusion in the whole sugar picture.

Mr. SPENCE. The same methods will be pursued, I presume, that have been pursued heretofore.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. The gentleman feels that it is necessary now?

Mr. SPENCE. I do. I feel the bill is necessary, and between the two alternatives that present themselves, I am certainly for the bill.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPENCE. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. MORRIS. I do not ask this question to be critical at all, but purely for information. Why is it that inventory control is so hard to explain, and why is it in the bill if no one seems to know just what it means? I would like to have a little enlightenment on it. I am not critical in asking the question.

Mr. SPENCE. I cannot give the gentleman a definite answer on inventory control. I presume it means that it is not spelled out in the bill. I presume it means that the Secretary would have control of the inventories of large users, to prevent hoarding of sugar, which they would naturally do, and I certainly do not think it is the import of the bill to give control to those engaged in the industries in which sugar is used.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has again expired.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 17 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I am satisfied that everybody in the Chamber desires to get back to free enterprise as soon as possible. We do not want any further regimentation unless it is absolutely necessary. We do not want any further controls on food or anything else unless it is necessary.

I know very little about sugar, but I was present and I heard all the witnesses who testified before the committee. I think what the people of America want is more sugar, but I am satisfied that if they knew they were not going to get more sugar, they would not want to pay a higher price for the sugar that they are getting and will receive. I am convinced that if you decontrol sugar at this particular time, the allocation will not be greater, and the price will jump sky high.

Now, here is what the witnesses testified to before us. I would like to say at this point that this bill extends price and ration control only until October 31 of this year, and inventory control until March 31 of next year, and provides that such controls shall be transferred to the Secretary of Agriculture. Now, what we mean by inventory control is those engaged in selling sugar. We do not want those engaged in selling sugar to withhold it from the consumers.

Mr. DOMENGEAUX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. DOMENGEAUX. Would the gentleman have any objection to an amendment on page 6 where inventory control is mentioned, but it makes no distinction as to whether that shall be commercial or industrial control? This could mean housewives' inventory, also.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. I do not have any objection to that, and the amendment should prevail. I brought out from witnesses myself that of this increased amount produced this year housewives will get a larger percentage than industrial users. I think the gentleman was there and heard some of the witnesses. I think the housewives should have more. I am in favor of giving the housewives, the people at home, a larger amount than industrial users.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DONDERO. Can the gentleman give the House any explanation as to the meaning of the language in lines 17 and 18 on page 6 of the resolution?

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. What does it say?

Mr. DONDERO. It refers to the inventory which may be continued until March 31, 1948.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. This means the inventory of the amount of sugar a dealer has on hand to sell and does not refer to the consumer. That is my interpretation. The fellow that sells the sugar does not have the right to hold it. He should not obtain a whole lot of sugar and then refuse to sell it to the consumers. A lot of people would do that with the idea that the sugar price would be increased when the controls were taken away, and it would not be distributed properly.

Mr. DONDERO. Did anybody appear before the gentleman's committee and make an explanation as to just what that did mean, if it was different from what the gentleman has just stated? The gentleman is the first one to explain it.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. I think everybody understood it that way. There was no necessity for explaining it.

A number of witnesses, representing consumers, producers, refiners, processors, wholesalers, retailers, and all classes engaged in the sugar industry, testified before the committee. Practically all of the witnesses stated it would not do to remove restrictions at this time, either on rationing of sugar or ceiling prices for sugar, for the reason that to do so would not bring any more production at this time but certainly would increase the price of sugar and would cause an uneven distribution of sugar in this country.

The testimony of the witnesses showed that production will be about 13 percent more this year than last year, and that another similar increase by next year would bring enough sugar to satisfy the needs for family use and industrial use.

All witnesses wanted continued restrictions on sugar no longer than necessary. Many of them stated that the law should be extended to at least October 31 of this year, as all of the crop will have been planted and much of it harvested by that time, and many others stated that authority for the controls should be extended to March 31, 1948.

The evidence shows that the needs of the United States for this year will be something over 8,000,000 short tons and that the sugar we will produce in the United States this year and our share of the sugar we have contracted for in other countries, including Cuba, will amount to something like 6,800,000 short tons. This estimate is based on acreage planted and to be planted. Therefore we will have a shortage this year of over 1,000,000 tons. It is expected that 6,800,000 tons will provide a per capita consumption for the year of about 87 pounds of refined sugar or 93 pounds raw value, as compared with the prewar per capita consumption of about 96 pounds of refined sugar or 103 pounds of raw value. We find ourselves facing an estimated shortage of more than a million tons of sugar, and there is no possible place in the world from which we can obtain more at any price. So we are forced to the conclusion, so far as this crop is concerned, that we will not get any more sugar for the housewives if controls are taken off, but probably the users of sugar would have to pay many times more than the present price.

I think every member of the Committee and of Congress would like to take controls off sugar at this time if we thought we would get more sugar, even at some reasonable increase in the price, but from the evidence produced to us, this is not the case, but the evidence is encouraging from the standpoint that we will have enough sugar produced to meet the needs for next year.

We all remember 1920 following World War I when the price of sugar went to 27 cents and more per pound. To take controls off at this time, might cause sugar to go this high again, with prospect of not getting any more sugar to satisfy the needs of our people. The evidence shows that uneven distribution and confusion would result and the probability is that housewives and small users would find that they had considerably less sugar than under a rationing system, and this is one reason there is such unanimity of opinion of all those in the sugar industry, including growers, processors, refiners, and trade associations representing such groups as ice cream, evaporated milk, confectioners, bottling, and many other manufacturers.

It is my understanding that a larger percent of increased production for this year was or will be given to housewives over industrial users, which is fair and right. Everyone knows that when sugar is in short supply and without allocation and equal distribution, the first to suffer will be the housewives and then the small industrial users. Many small users have no warehouse facilities for storing sugar nor the funds with which to buy large stocks like large industrial users, and as long as sugar is in short supply the people who would profit would be the speculators and the large users. The small users and the housewives cannot compete with the large users in this short field of supply.

People must understand that we produce in continental United States less than one-third enough sugar to supply our needs. Therefore we have to contract with producers outside of this country to obtain most of our sugar.

We contracted for the entire Cuban sugar crop, of which 3,150,000 short tons will come to the United States. It is thought that Cuba will produce around 5,500,000 short tons. We sent last year 400,000 tons to Europe and other foreign countries. It is estimated we will send less than that this year. This sugar shipped from the United States to foreign countries did not come out of our domestic supplies, but represents sugar that was brought from Cuba to this country for refining and subsequent shipment rather than being shipped direct from Cuba to the foreign countries.

The United States has been purchasing the entire quantity of Cuban sugar during the past few years, with the exception of the relatively small quantity reserved for local consumption in Cuba and for shipment to other American countries. The United States purchase, through the Commodity Credit Corporation, is made in behalf of all the countries which normally purchase some sugar in Cuba. This arrangement, whereby the United States is the sole purchaser, prevents the chaotic condition which would result if all the countries went into Cuba and bid against each other for the available supplies of sugar. This purchasing arrangement naturally leaves the United States with an obligation to share the sugar with the other countries in whose behalf we have purchased a part of it.

Under such arrangement, we will receive two-thirds of the sugar exported from Cuba this year and foreign countries will receive one-third. This represents our normal share of Cuban sugar. Also we get all the sugar that is produced in other countries, Puerto Rico and Hawaii, except what is needed for home consumption.

Since the Commodity Credit Corporation has purchased the entire Cuban sugar crop, the foreign countries receive their share of the Cuban sugar by accepting assignments of the CCC contract for their share of the sugar. This permits the foreign countries to make settlement directly with Cuba for the sugar they receive. In other words, we do not guarantee anything. We just assign them a part of the contract, and then they pay direct to Cuba and we are not involved in that. The Commodity Credit Corporation therefore assumes no financial risks on the sugar that is shipped to foreign countries.

Out of the 5,500,000 short tons produced in Cuba, 750,000 short tons is reserved for home consmption and for sale to other Latin-American countries.

Mr. Chairman, when we all understand the sugar situation I think we will be forced to one conclusion, that unless we extend for a short while the rationing and controls, we will not get any more sugar, and we all know we will have to pay a much higher price for the sugar that we do consume.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] has expired.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, House Joint Resolution 146, to extend the powers and authority under certain statutes with respect to the distribution and pricing of sugar, and for other purposes, has at least two serious flaws in it if the purpose of the resolution is to get rid of political control over sugar. The resolution provides for continuing price control and rationing of sugar until October 31, 1947. Then it qualifies this provision by providing that authority to continue inventory controls of sugar may be exercised until March 31, 1948. I think inventory control can become just as objectionable as rationing. If my memory serves me correctly, Administration witnesses testified against inventory control ostensibly on the ground that it would be difficult to operate. My objection to it is that it not only would be difficult to operate but impossible to operate equitably. I also object to it because it leaves the control boys with a string to the whole program of price ceilings on and rationing of sugar.

If it is really the intention of Congress to end political interference with sugar on that date, the bill should provide for ending price control and rationing of sugar on October 31, 1947—period.

But there is a far more serious flaw involved in this bill than inventory control. I refer to the power exercised by the International Emergency Food Council to pool the world's sugar supply and to ration out of that pool the United States share of sugar. The point is that even if the joint resolution before us does everything its face would indicate, we would still have rationing of sugar.

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. BUFFETT. Has the gentleman been able to find any place in the statute books where the Congress of the United States has authorized an international board to determine how much sugar the American people should have?

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. I am quite sure that the Congress never gave such authority. I am coming to that point in just a moment.

Mr. BUFFETT. One other question. When our committee met on this problem and as the Congress meets now, we are operating sort of like a coroner's jury—holding an inquest over how the sugar that has been allocated to us by an international board shall be disposed of. Is that right?

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. That is correct.

The International Emergency Food Council, one of the elements of world government, would continue to tell the United States how much sugar we can have. This would be true even if the United States increased its own sugar production. The people of the United States no longer have the power to say whether or not they shall eat the sugar they produce; that is now left to the one-world government, and this is something we ought to tell the housewives when they write to us for more sugar. Here again the political regime controlling our Government, which craves control and more control, is vested with an extraordinary power to manipulate our sugar supply.

I cannot find any legal authority whereby the President is given the power to enter into any international agreement which gives foreigners control over the sugar we produce.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. This International Board of Control the gentleman talks about met here in Washington about a month ago, did it not?

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. I am not sure.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I believe they did. They give us the right to have a representative on that board, do they?

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Oh, I think they extend us that little privilege.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. They give us that much courtesy, do they?

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. I suppose so.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Who is our representative on the board?

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. I understand the President is supposed to be.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. He, of course, does not sit on any board.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. But he is supposed to have the matter under his jurisdiction and he has, I believe designated the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If the gentleman will yield, it is Secretary Anderson.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. So far as I can learn it is just another one of those self-constituted powers of which we experienced so many in the last few years. In this connection it should be mentioned that the one-world government is not only telling the people of the United States how much sugar they can eat, but also how much wheat and other foods; indeed, it is in the process of applying the same principle to everything we produce. If the people of the United States like this sort of arrangement, if they are willing to share their produce with the rest of the world they have the right to do so. I doubt, however, that they have any such desire.

Certainly it is the duty of every Congressman to inform his constituents of the facts of the situation. They should know if they have not already learned that the political forces controlling our Government are giving America away as fast as they can, and so far as I am aware the United States Congress is doing nothing about it; indeed, it is lending itself to supporting this insane and suicidal policy.

Mr. KUNKEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. KUNKEL. I believe the gentleman is performing a public service in calling these facts to the attention of the American people, but does not the gentleman believe that this bill cannot properly deal with the question he has raised, the second question, the one of international control? After all, this particular bill is merely to end sugar rationing in the United States, and this international situation does not properly fall within the scope of the pending legislation.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. It certainly falls within the scope of the Congress of the United States and I think it is important enough that the Congress should give attention to it.

Mr. KUNKEL. Perhaps so, but it does not come within the scope of the pending legislation which deals purely with domestic matters.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. But in dealing with this important question in which an international board tells us how much sugar we can have, I think it is certainly relevant to go into the collateral issues of similar nature. This is a bill to continue sugar control, yet we are letting word go out to the people today that we are here considering ways and means for doing away with sugar controls to the extent that we can get more sugar. We are not doing our full duty, so long as we do not tell them about this entire international arrangement.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. The gentleman mentioned the international board and its activities. I call to the gentleman's attention an indication that there are some forces at work to limit the importation of Cuban sugar which during the war constituted a considerable source of supply to the people of the United States. Has the gentleman any information as to what this international board is going to do in relation to limiting the export of Cuban sugar to the United States?

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. How can anybody know what any international body is going to do?

Mr. KUNKEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. KUNKEL. I understand the International Emergency Food Council allotted from the Cuban crop somewhere in the neighborhood of 3,150,000 tons. There seems to be good reason to believe that the Cuban crop will exceed the estimate made at that time by 650,000 tons. Is there machinery by which that can be allotted to American housewives for canning purposes? Or does it have to lie in warehouses until the International Emergency Food Council meets again?

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. No; there is machinery to prevent it from coming into the United States; that is the International Emergency Food Council.

Mr. KUNKEL. In other words, as it stands, it will not come in.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. We will get our proportion, of course; or, we are supposed to get our share. Whether we will or not I do not know but I assume probably we shall.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 3 minutes for the purpose of clarifying this question of our participation in the International Emergency Food Council and our authority to participate in it.

Mr. Marshall, of the Department of Agriculture, was before the committee, and this question was asked, and it was debated at length before the committee. On page 67 of the hearings we find this following language in connection with a statement of the history and authority for the United States participation in the International Emergency Food Council. I want to say at the outset that the International Emergency Food Council has no legislative authority and never was given the authority to dictate our policy. It operates only as an advisory group. The report says in part:

> The authority for participation by the United States in the Combined Food Board and the International Emergency Food Council is derived from the inherent constitutional power of the President with respect to foreign affairs. It should be noted that the International Emergency Food Council merely makes recommendations based upon information mutually supplied by its members. As the Chief Executive of the Nation, it is clear that the President has authority to confer and consult with representatives of foreign powers for the purpose of discussing mutual problems and obtaining information necessary to him in the performance of his duties under the Constitution and Federal statutes. The United States Supreme Court said in United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corporation (1936) (299 U. S. 304, 318, 319, 320) that the United States is vested with all the powers of government necessary to maintain an effective control of international relations, including, as a power inherently inseparable from the conception of nationality, the authority to make such international agreements as do not constitute treaties in the constitutional sense. The Court stated, moreover, that in the field of foreign affairs, "the President alone has the power to speak or listen as a representative of the Nation" and that although he makes treaties with the advice and consent of the Senate "he alone negotiates." It then affirmed the doctrine that in the field of international affairs, the President is the constitutional representative of the United States who manages our concerns with foreign powers.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Take additional time, because I would like to have the point clarified.

Mr. WOLCOTT. It was clarified fully in the minds of the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. It was not clarified, I may say, in my judgment.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am sorry we have not been able to satisfy the gentleman on that. The gentleman brought this matter up in the hearings before the committee, and consequently we went into this matter very thoroughly and we thought we had satisfied him.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. We did not get any satisfaction in the hearing. I have gone over this matter with some attorneys, and they have advised me that there is no actual authority for this.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Whether they have authority or not, they merely act in an advisory capacity anyway. They have no status in the law except to advise with the President and the President is given authority under statutory law to ration and control the price of sugar.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOGGS].

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the committee bill. I am quite sure that in the debate that has preceded me it has been pointed out to the Members of this body that this bill was reported out to the House only after full and complete hearings; that in our hearings all of the representatives of the Government, the industry and all of its branches, with two exceptions, to my knowledge, supported this legislation.

I do not believe that it can be intelligently argued or questioned that at the present time this Nation has a serious sugar shortage. I have the honor and the privilege of representing one of the districts in the State of Louisiana which produces a large quantity of cane sugar. As all of you know, there are only two States in the Union which produce cane sugar, those being the States of Louisiana and Florida, and Louisiana by far producing the greatest amount.

Following the last World War we had the experience in this country of the price of sugar skyrocketing. For the moment it was a temporary benefit and advantage to the producers of the great State of Louisiana. But it ultimately resulted in the bankruptcy of practically all of the producers and all of the processors, and, representing a sugar district, I would be the last person in the world to advocate the removal of these controls at this time. I do feel, however, that the committee has been very wise in setting October 31, 1947, as the date for the final termination of these controls. That date was arrived at only after careful consideration by the members of the committee. It is significant because at that time the beet harvest is well under way and the cane harvest has also progressed so that by October 31, 1947, we will know not only what the production will be domestically in the cane and beet areas, but we will also know what the production will be offshore. In addition to that, it accords to our local producers, whether they be in the cane or beet areas, what little advantage of cost or price increase may accrue as the result of the removal of controls.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. I am very glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. I have listened with interest to the remarks of the gentleman about the termination date being the 31st day of October. In the event it turns out that the increase in the supply of sugar is not brought about by that date and it would be found desirable to continue controls beyond that particular time, does not the gentleman feel that some provision should be made in this bill because of the fact that at that time Congress will not be in session and could not act?

Mr. BOGGS of Lousiana. No; I do not think I would go along with the gentleman on that because if you refer to the hearings you will find I asked that very question of a number of witnesses who appeared before the committee and it is just as logical to argue that controls should be continued through 1948. By October 31, 1947, we will know definitely what our sugar supply is. So I feel that Congress wants to remove these controls, and the October 31 date is as logical a date as March 31, the date which has been suggested by some people.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to commend particularly the chairman of our committee, the distinguished gentleman from Michigan, who conducted these hearings in his usual fair way. All of the interests were permitted to be heard. I believe this bill comes before the House today by and large with the unanimous support of the committee.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. Why can we not end the controls on the 31st of this month?

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. To end the controls on the 31st of this month, that is, the 31st of March, would be a very dangerous thing because we now know exactly what our sugar supply is for this year, 1947. If you will refer to the report on this bill you will find that we are several million tons short of the demand. If we remove controls next week, which would be the end of this month, we would have such a scramble for the available supplies of sugar that the housewives who need it most would not get it and the big industrial users who have the advantage of being able to bid up the price and who have the greatest funds would get all the sugar in the United States.

Mr. PHILLIPS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. PHILLIPS of Tennessee. Does this bill make any provision for the housewives during the canning season?

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. I think it does.

Mr. PHILLIPS of Tennessee. What provision or section guarantees that any housewife will get additional sugar at the time she needs it most?

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. I am not familiar with that particular section or provision, but I do know, first, that the allocation of sugar to the housewives has been increased for the next two quarters which is the period for which this bill extends controls. In addition, there was a great deal of testimony before the committee on that particular subject. However, the chairman of the committee or the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SPENCE] might be better prepared to answer that particular inquiry.

Mr. PHILLIPS of Tennessee. Did I understand the gentleman to say that there was no real shortage of sugar? And if there is no real shortage of sugar, why should we have these controls extended?

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. No; I did not say there was no real shortage of sugar. I said, in my opinion, on October 31, 1947, ample supplies of sugar would be in sight but at the present time when the 1947 and 1946 crops have been harvested or already in warehouses in this country and the allocations to foreign countries have been made, there is a shortage of sugar.

Mr. PHILLIPS of Tennessee. Did the gentleman read the statement in the Herald Tribune on March 7, 1947, which said that the Department of Agriculture stated there was no shortage of sugar?

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. No. But that was not the testimony of the Department before the committee.

Mr. Chairman, I trust this bill will be adopted without amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from New York [Mr. KILBURN].

Mr. KILBURN. Mr. Chairman, I feel that we should decontrol sugar as soon as we possibly can so that the law of supply and demand will again operate with this commodity. Of course the best time to decontrol is when we have an adequate supply. Our committee heard many witnesses who have studied the sugar situation all over the world for years and I listened attentively to their testimony. I feel the most valuable witness was our able colleague the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD] who during the last 12 months has visited every sugar-producing country in the world north of the Equator and probably knows as much about sugar as anyone in the House. His argument that October was the best time to remove controls carried great weight with me. He said that the crop from the continent of the United States would be available by that time and the Cuban crop would be available the following January to June. By announcing that time as termination date the beet-sugar growers of this country can go ahead this spring and summer and increase their acreage so that around that time of year we should have as good a supply as we are ever likely to get.

We put a provision in this bill to have the Department of Agriculture continue inventory controls until March 31, 1948. This was for the purpose of preventing large industrial users from stocking up before controls go off or right afterward.

I feel that whenever sugar is decontrolled the price will undoubtedly go up and our problem was to set the date of decontrol at the time of year when we would probably have the biggest supply available, in order to prevent too drastic a rise. Last year when jellies, jams, pastry, and so forth, were decontrolled the price, of course, went up and as a result the housewife is now paying between 25 and 30 cents a pound for the sugar going into those products when she buys them. The sugar-using products that the housewife buys account for about half the families' total consumption. So even if the housewife has to pay more for the sugar she buys from the grocer she will undoubtedly pay less for sugar used in the manufactured products and she will be in a position to put up her own jellies, jams, fruits, and so forth.

Generally speaking, the sooner we can have a free market and get the readjustment over with the better and the more likely we are to have an adequate sugar supply. For that reason I support this bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. COLE].

Mr. COLE of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I do not favor price or rationing control in a peacetime economy. This bill, however, in my opinion, is legislation to decontrol prices and rationing and, therefore, I support it.

This bill provides for the elimination of OPA, and for the first time we have set a definite, positive, fixed date upon which this commodity shall be decontrolled. That date has been fixed as of October 31, 1947, because at that time, we will know exactly what amount of sugar will be available for 1948. In addition, consumption will be at a minimum and production at a maximum. The possibility of speculation and exorbitant prices will be remote.

But the important thing, I repeat, Mr. Chairman, is the announced policy of decontrol.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES].

Mr. REES. Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the provisions of this bill contained on page 9, beginning with line 16, reading as follows:

> Such personnel as the Director of the Bureau of the Budget determines to be required may also be transferred temporarily to the Department of Agriculture pending termination in whole or in part of the powers, functions, and duties transferred by subsection (a) of this section.

I call your attention to the fact that as the bill is presently written it violates the provisions of the Veterans' Preference Act of 1944. This question is raised in a telegram that I think many of the Members have received from Col. John Thomas Taylor, legislative representative of the American Legion, which reads in part as follows:

> Language of resolution would transfer employees from OPA to Department of Agriculture temporarily. Use of word "temporarily" destroys protection of veterans employed by OPA who would be transferred to Agriculture which protection contained in Veterans' Preference Act of 1944. Would appreciate your cooperation to ascertain that language of resolution is amended so veterans' preference is preserved for each war veteran involved in transfer.

I discussed this matter with the Legal Division of the Civil Service Commission, and it is their opinion that the word "temporarily" in this resolution would empower the Department of Agriculture to eliminate the employees who were transferred from the Office of Price Administration without competition with employees now or hereafter employed in the Department of Agriculture. The belief, in which I concur, is that the above provision would nullify the following language of the Veterans' Preference Act, section 12:

And provided further, That when any or all of the functions of any agency are transferred to, or when any agency is replaced by, some other agency, or agencies, all preference employees in the function or functions transferred or in the agency which is replaced by some other agency shall first be transferred to the replacing agency, or agencies, for employment in positions for which they are qualified, before such agency, or agencies, shall appoint additional employees from any other source for such positions.

The intention of Congress in this provision of section 12 of the Veterans' Preference Act was to insure the protection of the employees with veterans' preference who were transferred from one agency to another by virtue of the fact that the functions and duties of that particular agency were transferred to another agency. Under the present language the Department of Agriculture would be able to eliminate all of the employees transferred from the OPA, regardless of their veterans' preference or other rights as civil-service employees.

When the proper time comes I shall offer an amendment to protect the veterans' preference rights under the Veterans' Preference Act of 1944. I have prepared an amendment which will, at the end of this section, line 23 on page 9, add these words:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall in any wise be construed to violate any of the provisions of the Veterans' Preference Act of 1944.

I think the members of this committee are as anxious to see that veterans' rights are protected as they were when they passed the Veterans' Preference Act of 1944. I trust that when the time comes for the consideration of this amendment I may secure the unanimous approval of this committee. I should also add that this matter was discussed in a meeting of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. It was agreed by the members present that an amendment should be submitted to this legislation to provide for proper protection of veterans' rights under the Veterans' Preference Act of 1944.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REES. I am glad to yield to the distinguished chairman of this committee.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I might state that it was not the intent of the committee or any member of the committee that I know of, to in any manner interfere with the civil-service status of any employee. The word "temporary" was used solely in respect to the length of his employment in that particular department. It was explanatory of the fact that we were setting up these controls temporarily and that did not change in any manner the status of the individual.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES] has expired.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman three additional minutes.

If there is any question about it, I make the suggestion that the gentleman broaden the language of his amendment to include the assertion that this language shall in no manner affect the civil-service status of any employee so transferred, because I am afraid if we say it shall not change the veteran's preference status, by saying that, we might indicate we are changing the status of other employees in other respects.

Mr. REES. To do that you could strike out the word "temporarily."

Mr. WOLCOTT. No, no; because we do not want those employees transferred permanently to the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. REES. I can see what is in the gentleman's mind. I believe my first proposal is the proper one to follow.

Mr. WOLCOTT. We want to make it clear that the status is not changed so long as they are temporarily working for the Secretary of Agriculture, but when he gets through with them they may either be transferred back to the OPA, if OPA is in existence, or transferred to other agencies, or, under the Civil Service rules and regulations, I presume they could be transferred permanently to the Department of Agriculture. But under the provisions of this law they cannot be transferred permanently to the Department of Agriculture. We save the Civil Service Commission in any prerogatives or rights that they may have under the Civil Service law to protect, in full, the status of civil-service employees. This word "temporarily" has nothing whatsoever to do with the status of the employee. It has to do with the length of his employment.

Mr. REES. The thing in which I am deeply interested is this, that when a veteran is transferred under the terms of this measure to the Department of Agriculture, that veteran should have the right, as is required under the Veterans' Preference Act, to compete with any other employee in the Department of Agriculture holding a similar position, in the event of reduction in force. He should have the right of veterans' preference preserved if he is transferred to the Department of Agriculture. You should not hold him out separate from other groups.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Should a veteran who is now working in OPA have the right, in his present status, to compete with those in the Department of Agriculture, in a comparable status?

Mr. REES. As an employee in the Department of Agriculture, certainly he should have that right. He becomes an employee of the Department of Agriculture and has such rights as accrue to him as an employee of that Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has again expired.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DOMENGEAUX].

Mr. DOMENGEAUX. Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt in my mind that every man in this Congress today desires to bring about decontrol of sugar as soon as it is safe and proper to do so.

I represent probably the largest sugar-producing area in this country. The question to my mind is when should this be done. My area of south Louisiana also produces an enormous amount of rice. We were very much chagrined when the President continued control on rice and sugar. We thought we were being discriminated against. But after deliberation and thought, it was inevitable that we come to the conclusion that sugar controls should continue, because of the short supply that existed. We do not want a repetition of what occurred after the last war, where every sugar planter, processor, and refiner was virtually bankrupt, and failures were wholesale. We do not want prices to skyrocket like they did during that period. But we do want sugar controls to go off as quickly as possible.

The October 31 date as written in the bill by the committee to my mind is a very reasonable and logical one.

Mr. RAMEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOMENGEAUX. I yield.

Mr. RAMEY. I am seeking information only, and I may say to the gentleman that I am not a member of his committee. We in my section of Ohio are very much interested in the peach crop. We are consumers of peach crop, and I am wondering if additional rations for canning purposes are being considered.

Mr. DOMENGEAUX. I am not a member of the committee either, I may say to the gentleman from Ohio, but I am informed that such testimony was given before the committee. I was not present myself and cannot testify.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOMENGEAUX. I yield.

Mr. SPRINGER. May I say to my distinguished colleague that Subcommittee No. 4 of the Judiciary Committee has been hearing evidence under the Second War Powers Act. That has been completed. The gentleman mentioned something about rationing a little while ago. We had a very distinguished gentleman who testified before our committee and from the statements he made there seemed to be no necessity for continuing rice under the controls it has been held under heretofore. I would like to have the gentleman give an explanation on that subject if he will.

Mr. DOMENGEAUX. I think that is a correct statement, because production of rice in the United States today is 50 percent more than its normal consumption and export to its normal markets such as Puerto Rico and Cuba. The only justification for rice control at the present time in my opinion is possibly export control, but nct domestic control, because such domestic control would prevent a maximum development of such markets.

Mr. SPRINGER. Does the gentleman feel that it is necessary that the export control be continued?

Mr. DOMENGEAUX. Yes; I do, and that seems to be the unanimous opinion of the producers, processors, and millers of rice in my section of the country.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOMENGEAUX. I yield.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. The same question was directed to the gentleman that was directed to me a few moments ago in my remarks about sugar for the housewife. If the gentleman will refer to page 8 of the committee report he will note that the sugar ration for this year, 1947, has been increased approximately 10 pounds per person over what it was last year, which means approximately 30 or 40 pounds per family.

Mr. DOMENGEAUX. I think that is correct. It simply shows that sugar supplies are improving day by day in this country.

Mr. ROBSION. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOMENGEAUX. I yield.

Mr. ROBSION. Does the gentleman think we would have more or less sugar if we did not pass this bill?

Mr. DOMENGEAUX. I do not believe the question of control or decontrol would either increase or decrease production. There is no incentive situation involved in this decontrol measure; but it will do this, it will put back the operations to a normally competitive market which I think will give a better flow of the sugar which is available.

Mr. ROBSION. That will be after October.

Mr. DOMENGEAUX. After October 31, 1947.

Mr. ROBSION. Would the provisions of this bill permit any greater quantity of sugar to be shipped to foreign countries?

Mr. DOMENGEAUX. No; it would not, and as a matter of fact none of our domestically produced sugars have ever been shipped to foreign countries.

If I may continue, I am gratified to see the committee bring out this bill decontrolling sugar as of October 31. Without wishing to be presumptive, it carries with it the major provisions which were contained in House Joint Resolution 115, which I introduced earlier. In my bill there was provision that sugar be decontrolled on October 31 and it also contained inventory controls, the transfer of powers to the Secretary of Agriculture, and a provision allowing new users to participate in sugar supplies.

The question of timing is paramount and important in the question of the decontrol of sugar, and it is proper that October should be that date because October is the statistical date that is employed and has always been employed in the sugar markets. It is also the date when the annual estimates of sugar are established and determined. It is the date when the estimates as to beet and cane sugars from Louisiana, Florida beet areas, Cuba, Puerto Rico, Virgin Islands, and Hawaii are determined. It would be the most ridiculous thing in the world to me to see sugar decontrolled at any other date than September or October, because if you carry it on beyond the year it would only mean this: The Louisiana people who produce sugar and who market their sugar from November on would certainly retain their sugar and not put it on the market, with the result that it would contribute to a short supply. The same would result from other areas who normally market before such date. The reasonable time to decontrol this sugar is before your producers put their sugars on the market, so that the legitimate increase, should any result at the end of October, would go to those people who are entitled to those increases, and they are the producers of sugar and not the speculators. We know that our anticipated consumption for 1948 will be approximately 8,000,000 short tons of sugar. We estimate the production for a similar period, from the mainland and beet areas, will be 2,200,000 tons; from Hawaii, approximately 800,000 tons; from Puerto Rico, 1,000,000 tons; and from Cuba, 5,500,000 tons—or a total of 9,500,000 tons.

Now, all of this sugar in the past, historically, belonged to the United States, and we used such sugars. Today, however, part of the Cuban crop becomes a part of the international arrangement. But the fact still remains that the anticipated production of sugar is going to be substantially larger than it has been in the past. There is an element of risk involved in the decontrol of sugar, and that element exists today; it will exist in October, it will exist in March, and it will exist next October.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has again expired.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. DOMENGEAUX. There is always going to be an element of risk involved in the decontrol of sugar, and we might as well understand that there may be and probably will be an increase in the price of sugar. But I believe that after a very short time it will moderate itself and it will go back to normalcy, and it is only reasonable and proper that when the production is about equal to the requirements, that the great sugar industry in this country should have an opportunity to readjust itself in times like these, so that when hard times come, when production comes, they will have adjusted themselves into a normal market and will be in a better position to meet those problems.

Certainly, if sugar goes up a little bit, and I think it will, that is not unreasonable, because sugar today and always has been the cheapest commodity on the American market. You are paying about 9 cents for sugar today, and in comparison it has gone up very, very little to what other commodities have. Actually you could not produce sugar in this country under the market prices if it were not for the subsidies that are provided for by this Government.

So, I say that October 31 is the date on which sugar should be decontrolled. The other body has a bill which provides for the decontrol of sugar after March 31. That bill, I understand, will be taken up today or tomorrow. Certainly, I have no criticism of that but I do hope that they will see the situation as the House will and that they will join with us in meeting the date of October 31.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOMENGEAUX. I am happy to yield to my colleague.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. The gentleman, coming from a large sugar-producing area, is thoroughly familiar with the sugar situation. Does he believe that the production situation will be any different on October 31 than it will be on March 31?

Mr. DOMENGEAUX. The gentleman is perfectly correct. There will be no difference. There can be no difference, because the production period is determined as of October 31. The situation, insofar as greater or lesser supplies are concerned, should change at all between the period of October 31 and March 31 of the following year.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOMENGEAUX. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. HARDY. Do I understand that the fixing of the date as of October 31 is predicated on a belief that the sugar situation, the supply situation at that time, will be substantially ample to take care of our requirements?

Mr. DOMENGEAUX. That is the general proposition. It is the estimate of anticipated production on that date.

Mr. HARDY. That anticipation is based on current production estimates?

Mr. DOMENGEAUX. That is correct.

Mr. HARDY. Is it not within the realm of possibility that there might be a serious curtailment in our production between now and October 31?

Mr. DOMENGEAUX. That is possible as to any commodity. There is an element of risk.

Mr. HARDY. That was my point. That being the case, how long prior to October 31 would it be possible to determine whether on October 31 we might be faced with a serious shortage?

Mr. DOMENGEAUX. That could be determined say 15 days previous, October 15.

Mr. HARDY. In such event, what action can the gentleman recommend?

Mr. DOMENGEAUX. That is the risk that is involved in any such operation as this.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOMENGEAUX. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Is it not a fact that the same risk would be taken if you adopted March 31, 1948?

Mr. DOMENGEAUX. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. So that you could make a case for continuing control of sugar.

Mr. DOMENGEAUX. There is no doubt about that. You would be constantly confronted with the same uncertainties that exist as of that date.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOMENGEAUX. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Suppose on the 15th day of March 1948 Cuba, an independent republic, announces to the United States that it does not propose to harvest any more sugarcane? What are you going to do on March 31, 1948? I submit to those who argue that date.

Mr. DOMENGEAUX. The price would go sky high and you would have little chance of supplying our requirements.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That could happen any time under a free economy?

Mr. DOMENGEAUX. Absolutely.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MURRAY].

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, first, I want to compliment this splendid committee for bringing in this bill.

Listening to the debate, I could not help but think about the efforts this committee made a year ago in bringing in their price-control bill, which later was vetoed by the President, because the principle involved here today is, as far as sugar is concerned, just one example of what this committee tried to do as far as all the many articles that were under control at the time. Therefore, I think this is an admission here among ourselves that we are going to take sugar and do the same thing as we tried to do in the bill of a year ago.

The reason I asked for this time, Mr. Chairman, is to clarify once more exactly what is going to happen in the conservation of one of our greatest foods. Great losses of a splendid food is taking place at this time. I am speaking of dried skim milk. I do not want to take your time to describe it any more than to say that it has something over 35 percent digestible animal protein. It is the cheapest food in the world today. Until 1935 its production for animal use and human use was not kept separately. One of the most constructive pieces of food conservation that took place during this war took place in the diversion of this dried skim milk from animal feeding to human use. In fact, by 1946, there were only 15,000,000 pounds going into animal feeding. The chances are a large part of that 15,000,000 pounds may have been spoiled during the process and might not have been fit for human consumption. Last year we produced 663,000,000 pounds of this wonderful product.

There has been plenty of criticism because no more effort was made to conserve the food value of the millions of bushels of potatoes that were wasted. Many people feel that more effort should have been made to recapture the food in this potato crop and divert those potatoes to human consumption. Facing, as we do today, a large increase in the production of certain manufactured dairy products, which means an increase in the production of this powdered skim milk, we are going to face throughout the next few months a more serious problem than we ever had before. What I am addressing myself to is the importance of providing sugar so that we can conserve as large a quantity as possible of this skim milk that is going down the drain in the thousands of tons and is liable to go from now on during the flush season.

So that we may have it right in the record, once and for all, may I ask the distinguished chairman if he feels in his own heart and in his own mind that this skim milk is having the consideration that it should have, and if he feels that every effort will be made to conserve this great food?

Mr. WOLCOTT. If the intent of the committee in this legislation is carried out, that matter would get all of the consideration which it deserves, taking into account its importance in relation to the over-all program. We found it rather difficult in laying out this program to set aside any certain percentage of our sugar stock for any particular use. As I said, we must give the administration of this law to somebody, and we thought if it was given to the Secretary of Agriculture he would give more sympathetic consideration to the use of sugar for the preservation of foods than at present. So we have made it very clear. It is the intent of the committee, and we should make it clear now that it is the intent of the Congress, that in the allocation of sugar in respect to so-called hardship cases or the cases of new users, that the Secretary of Agriculture in carrying out the provisions shall make reasonable provision for meeting the needs of users of sugar in case of hardship. You note we use the word "shall" which means that it is mandatory.

Then we stress the fact that we intend he shall make larger quantities available for the preservation of milk, including cases where sugar is needed to avoid the wastage of milk or other food products. We mention milk here specifically along with other food products, giving emphasis to the necessity for the allocation of sugar to prevent the spoiling of millions of gallons of food in the form of milk which might otherwise be preserved for our use and the use of people all over the world.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I thank the gentleman. I think every one of us realizes that with the huge appropriation being made in connection with our food program in our country and all over the world we must be careful that we recapture and preserve all the food that we produce rather than come to Congress for a $100,000,000 for this and a $100,000,000 for that in the name of agriculture. At least, we ought to make some concerted constructive effort to conserve the food that is produced and not allow it to be continually wasted.

Mr. ROBSION. The gentleman who is addressing the House is a very able member of the great Committee on Agriculture, and as I understand it he favors this bill. Does the gentleman favor the bill?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROBSION. In what way will that help the American housewife or other consumers of sugar?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. It can be made to help the housewife. I do not know of any way that we can properly get out from under these controls except gradually as we voted to do a year ago. That is the reason why we must submit to certain controls and must submit to a control over exports for a while longer.

Mr. ROBSION. And under this bill the controls are extended to October 31.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Yes. By October 31 we should know pretty well what the sugar production of this country is going to be. We should have a pretty good idea of it.

Mr. ROBSION. The gentleman is telling us that this bill is necessary and essential in the interest of the American housewives and canners and other consumers of sugar?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I am. I think if it is properly handled and if the sugar is used for the right purpose, it is the very best measure that we can have at the present time.

I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD].

Mr. CRAWFORD. The gentleman has correctly observed that by October 31 we will know the production of sugar in the United States for this current calendar crop year. Likewise, we will know the production in Europe and all the sugar-beet fields in the world by October 31.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. We will also know what Cuba will have produced from the cane now going to the mills and thus settle this question of the 654,000 additional tons which it was announced in this country it is expected that the Cuban sugar production will be over and above all estimates previously made in the last 60 days by the Government.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I thank the gentleman. It has long been recognized that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD] is one of the Nation's greatest sugar authorities. I am pleased to find he is in support of this legislation.

The following data and comments are submitted at this point.

DRIED SKIM MILK

Mr. Chairman, dried skim milk is a food product that never has and apparently is not now sufficiently appreciated. This product has a content of 35.6 percent of good digestible animal protein.

When one realizes that meat has but from 15 to 20 percent digestible protein, it is apparent why every effort should be made to save every pound of dried skim milk and use it for human consumption.

The Agriculture Department recently placed a floor price of 10 cents per pound on the product. Even the OPA in its wisdom provided a 14½ cents per pound ceiling price.

Skim milk plus millions of bushels of wasted potatoes could have been used for concentrated soups. Today additional sugar should be allocated so that skim milk could be canned in the form of condensed sweetened skim.

Why waste foods after they have been produced. Why appropriate millions to encourage additional food production if our agencies are not conserving and processing the good foods already produced.

The following is a table showing both the amounts of dried skim produced and the diversion of dried skim from animal feed to human food.

The product is used in the baking industry and for the manufacture of ice cream and candy. In condensed form as well as in dried form the product has been combined with cream and reconstituted and used as fluid milk in many areas during the past few years.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VAN ZANDT].

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, I rise at this time to support House Joint Resolution 146 and in doing so wish to compliment the House Banking and Currency Committe for an honest effort to solve the sugar problem.

There is no issue more confused or more difficult to understand than the scarcity of sugar.

During the past week end, when talking to an industrial sugar user in Altoona, Pa., he convinced me that practically everyone but the American people can obtain an adequate supply of sugar. He read a letter that he received from a broker in New York City containing the following statements:

How are you fixed up on cocoa butter, milk chocolate in bales, or Brazilian bitter chocolate in bags or cases?

Then he read this statement:

Imports of sugar candy and confections from all countries to the United States rose from 1,166,000 pounds in 1942 to 62,575,000 pounds in 1945.

He concluded his discussion by informing me that during a recent visit to the post office he was told that a 5-pound package of American granulated sugar that a resident of Sweden sent to a relative here in the United States, was awaiting delivery until the necessary ration stamps could be given to the Post Office Department. In other words, American-processed sugar sent to Sweden was returned to the United States to a relative.

Foreign manufacturers of cocoa butter and milk chocolate requiring sugar seem to have no difficulty in producing chocolate containing sugar. In general, foreign manufacturers have no difficulty in making sugar candy and confections and sending them to the United States. Foreign citizens have no trouble getting sugar from the United States and then returning it to relatives in this country. Is it any wonder the American people are bewildered and confused?

American housewives have been too patient and have accepted so many flimsy excuses that it is time we have an honest allocation of sugar supplies with the insistence that the United States receive an adequate amount of sugar for the needs of the American people.

The House Committee on Banking and Currency is to be commended for establishing a date upon which sugar controls will terminate because until we get the Government out of the hair of the American people we are going to continue to be faced with confusion and chaos in handling the supply of sugar in the United States.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BUFFETT].

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Chairman, I asked for this minute in order to ask the chairman of the committee if he thinks it is intended that the hardship provision in the bill is intended to provide relief for retailers for their inventory to meet the impact of the increase in the stamp ration from 5 pounds to 10 pounds.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If there are any hardships created by increasing the value of the sugar stamp to the retail grocer, it is my opinion that the Secretary of Agriculture will have to give consideration to it, under the language of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself three additional minutes to answer the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield.

Mr. OWENS. At the time of the hearings the statement was made that we feel should be clarified so that the agency may know just how far it should go and what it is required to do insofar as setting up new businesses is concerned. Then it says particularly so since the effect of the new user's provision would be to increase the available supply of sugar for the industrial users. I would like to include the housewives and everyone who uses sugar in that provision concerning new users, to have that clarified enough to let the housewives and industrial users know whether they are going to be deprived of sugar which they previously had.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I do not think there should be any question about this. This will be enough with respect to that. In making available sugar for new users, the Secretary of Agriculture is not limited by too rigid standards or even suggestions in the act, except that we do compel him to make available some sugar for new users. It may be assumed that if it develops that the Secretary should make available, for example, 10 percent of any increase to new industrial users, then the present industrial and commercial users, will have to have 10 percent taken from the increase. So that if there is an increase of 15 percent to the industrial user, as I believe it is contemplated, and it develops that the new users must have 10 percent of that increase, then the new industrial and commercial users will have 10 percent of the increase deducted from the 15 percent. I have gone a long way around to explain the situation but I think that would inevitably happen, but it would not be taken from the allocation which they have at the present time. It would be taken from the increase over any allocation they now have.

Mr. OWENS. That makes it very plain.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEATING].

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, although I do not like continued governmental controls and hope they can and will be eliminated just as rapidly as is consistent with safety, I have become convinced that the temporary continuance of control over the supply of sugar is necessary in order to give the housewives of this country something like an adequate supply at a reasonable price. My fear is that if we do not support this measure we will find in short order that all our sugar will be gobbled up by industrial users or at least its price will be inflated by the volume consumers to such a point that the housewives cannot buy it or will have to pay a price way out of all reason. With some reluctance therefore I plan to support this legislation.

I do want to ask a question of the distinguished chairman, however, with reference to the very last paragraph of the bill because I think it is not desirable, unless absolutely necessary, to extend governmental control over anything that is not now covered. In the first place, are these liquid sugar, sirups, and molasses and sugar-containing products mentioned in this paragraph now covered by controls, and if they are not, what is the reason for bringing those allied products under this bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. They are covered at the present time. I suggest that the gentleman not to be confused by the use of the word "saccharin" in line 3. That is not the saccharin that you buy in a drugstore in bottles, which is not made from these products

Mr. KEATING. I have been informed by certain industrial users in my district that the present price control is only over sugar derived from sugar cane and sugar beets. Is that in error?

Mr. WOLCOTT. We cannot add new products under the language of the bill. We could not bring other commodities under control which were not under control on February 18, 1947, which is an arbitrary date. On page 6, if the gentleman will refer to his work copy of House Joint Resolution 146, we provide:

That the power contained herein shall not be deemed (i) to permit the allocation or rationing of any product (other than the allocation of such product imported or brought into the continental United States) unless a regulation providing for allocation or rationing thereof was in effect on February 18, 1947.

So this bill could not be interpreted as broadening any authority which was not in operation on February 18, 1947, in respect to use, rationing and price control which existed on that date.

Mr. KEATING. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TWYMAN].

Mr. TWYMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to commend the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES], chairman of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, for having called attention to the word "temporarily" on page 9, line 18, and to ask that this committee give favorable consideration to the amendment which I understand the gentleman from Kansas intends to offer.

I want you to know that our committee heard both sides of this question. We came to the conclusion that we should be concerned with the protection of the veterans who are going to be involved by reason of transfer to the Department of Agriculture. I think everyone here appreciates that these men should have the same standing as those presently employed by the Department of Agriculture when it comes to be necessary to reduce the force. We understand that this whole provision of the extension of controls is temporary. We do not believe those men should be sacrificed by the inadvertent use of this unfortunate word "temporarily." I do hope that favorable consideration will be given to the amendment when it is offered.

Unless the word "temporarily" is eliminated from this bill a serious injustice may be done to a large number of veterans who are transferred as a result of the passage of this act. I feel that we should carry out the provisions of the Veterans' Preference Act. I am glad the American Legion and other veterans' organizations were alert and brought this to the attention of the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLANNAGAN].

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise primarily for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a few questions.

Mr. Chairman, I think the sugar rationing program created more resentment among the American housewives than any program ever inaugurated. Take the situation down in my district. During the canning season the housewife could go to any country store and find plenty of soft drinks, plenty of candy, and yet she could not find the sugar to can the fruit that was going to waste.

I believe some provision should be made to give American housewives sufficient sugar to can her fruits and berries. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee if provision (b) on page 7 providing for hardship cases would take care of the American housewives during the canning season?

Mr. WOLCOTT. If there were going to be food wastage at that time, as there of course would be if she were not given reasonably adequate supplies, then I think under the language of the bill and the interpretation expressed in the report, the Secretary of Agriculture would have to give consideration to those cases as hardship cases. The language we have used in the committee report would indicate our intent in that respect.

Mr. FLANNAGAN. It would indicate the intent of Congress to give additional sugar to the American housewives during the canning season provided under the allotments made to them, they could not obtain sufficient sugar to can their fruits and vegetables to tide them over to the next canning season.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Under the language of the bill and under the language in the committee report, the Secretary of Agriculture must give reasonable consideration to the alleviation of those cases if otherwise there is likely to be a wastage of food products.

Mr. FLANNAGAN. There was a tremendous wastage of food products during the last canning season, I think, not only in my district, but all over the country. A lot of food went to waste due to the fact that the housewife could not get the sugar with which to can.

I would like to ask the ranking minority member if the interpretation given by the chairman is his interpretation of the language.

Mr. SPENCE. I think it is a reasonable interpretation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, may I say to the Members of the House that I take this time to ask the chairman of the committee a few questions, and preliminarily to asking those questions may I say that subcommittee No. 4 of the Committee on the Judiciary has been holding hearings on the Second War Powers Act, which includes also title III of that act which relates to allocations and priorities under which practically all of this sugar rationing and allocations has been handled. At this moment, and before we complete the executive sessions of that committee, and in rewriting whatever will be rewritten with respect to the Second War Powers Act I would like to ask the chairman of the committee two or three questions, if I may have the gentleman's attention at this time.

I note under the bill which is before the House, Mr. Chairman, that it provides that notwithstanding any other provisions of law, title III of the Second War Powers Act of 1942 and the amendments thereto, and title XIV of the Second War Powers Act of 1942, are eliminated, apparently, by this bill. The question now comes under title III of the Second War Powers Act as to whether or not that title should be extended insofar as allocations and priorities are concerned with respect to sugar or whether or not this pending bill, if passed, will fully cover and take care of everything with respect to the allocation of sugar with the present shortage? I would like to have a definite answer on that subject, if I may.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Upon the effective date of this bill, all the powers necessary to ration sugar will be in effect, because this bill continues the provisions of title III and title IV of the Second War Powers Act of 1942, insofar as they relate to sugar. Therefore, since the bill would continue the sugar-rationing-authority provisions of title III of the Second War Powers Act of 1942 it would not be necessary to continue them by other legislation.

Mr. SPRINGER. In other words, as I understand, if this pending bill is passed it will be wholly unnecessary for any extension under the Second War Powers Act, or the allocations provided thereunder with respect to sugar; is that correct?

Mr. WOLCOTT. It would not only be unnecessary, it would be quite redundant.

Mr. SPRINGER. Another question, if I may be permitted. As I understand, with the passage of this act, it will not interfere in any way with the allocation of sugar under rationing stamp 11; that is, those who have possession of the stamp will be entitled to receive 10 pounds of sugar rather than 5 pounds of sugar, and this act will not tend to affect that allocation in any way whatever. That notwithstanding the provisions of the pending bill the housewives will be entitled to receive 10 pounds of sugar on stamp No. 11, and those following.

Mr. WOLCOTT. That is my understanding. As a matter of fact, we hope it will not be necessary to print any more stamps. The commitments we have made are transferred to the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish to thank the chairman for that information and those answers. This information will be very helpful to subcommittee No. 4 of the Judiciary Committee. What we desire, and that which I seek to secure, is an ample allocation of sugar for household use throughout our country and an ample amount of sugar for canning purposes. We must aid in saving the fruit for use in every home in our Nation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS].

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] spoke on the rule the other day he said:

> I am pleased because some of the gentlemen who are members of this committee and others used to charge that all of the legislation enacted by the so-called New Deal is bad and vicious.

Then he expressed his pleasure over the fact that controls on sugar were being continued.

Controls on sugar may be continued, but there is certainly no pleasure in it and it is not being done because the wartime controls were a good thing. We are having sugar trouble today because of the sugar policy followed by this Government over the last 25 or 30 years. It is because we have not produced sufficient sugar domestically. Whenever we are dependent upon foreign producers for a greater portion of any commodity we will be in trouble in time of national emergency and in time of war.

Few people realize that before the war an American farmer who wanted to produce sugar beets, even though his land was adapted to it, could not get that right. That situation still exists so far as long-range planning is concerned. Our sugar troubles began a long time ago. The situation we are facing today started back when the quota on Philippine sugar was removed in the passage of the Underwood tariff. Up until that time a limit of 400,000 tons on the importation of sugar from the Philippines had been maintained. It was taken off in the Underwood tariff. American Spanish, English, and Dutch capital then moved into the Philippines. The islands became a one-crop economy, perhaps to their hurt. The imports into this country continued until they exceeded 1,000,000 tons. In the meantime the American sugar industry got in a bad way, it was chaotic. They came to the Congress and asked for relief, and we had the Jones-Costigan Act, and later on the Sugar Act under which we are now operating, which put a quota on the production of sugar. Congress said that American farmers could have only a small portion of the sugar market in the United States. We were in that sort of an economy and subject to that sort of control when the war came along. Henry Wallace went up and down the country advocating the discontinuance of our domestic sugar industry.

The people in the territory that I have the honor to represent want to produce more sugar. They have land and water adapted to it. We could easily supply sugar beets for four or five more sugar factories, but the Sugar Act must be removed first.

This Congress in the last session passed the Philippines Trade Act. We established a precedent and said that the Philippine Islands shall have in the postwar future the same share of our domestic market as they had before. This means that all the other off-shore producers, whether Cuba, Puerto Rico, South America, or other foreign countries, are going to insist that they be not cut down. It means a program of only a small portion of our sugar being produced in the continental United States. It is wrong and unwise.

There is something that can be done so we will not always be threatened with a sugar shortage and high prices, and I hope the Committee on Agriculture can keep it in mind when they revise the Sugar Act. We should limit these offshore producers of sugar to the number of tons of sugar that they produced for us in the prewar days. I would go further, but we should limit them that much at least. This means that any additional sugar that we need here by reason of increased per capita consumption should be produced by the American beet and cane producers. It means also that the sugar needed to feed our increased population should be produced here at home. The population has increased from 120,000,000 at the time this program was formulated to approximately 140,000,000 at the present time. You are facing a sugar problem today because we have not been self-sufficient in regard to sugar.

Mr. COLE of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. COLE of Kansas. I was very much interested in what the gentleman said particularly in the beginning of his statement. I call the gentleman's attention to the statement I made awhile ago, that this is not a sugar control bill, it is a bill to de-control sugar. The timing element is important.

Mr. CURTIS. Yes; but when you decontrol under this bill you still have the Sugar Act and you still have the Philippine trade bill. You gentlemen who served in the last Congress will recall how the Committee on Ways and Means voted to cut the quota for producers of sugar in the Philippines. This would have helped our domestic producers of sugar and it would have helped the Philippines by preventing their return to a one-crop economy. An attack was made on that action. Editorials were published, and the State Department carried on a campaign, and that action was later reversed.

We have started off again on a program of depending on offshore producers for our sugar. The answer to our sugar problem is more production of sugar within the continental limits of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, with millions and millions of people starving throughout the world, why should rich Uncle Sam go into the markets of the world and buy any food and bring it here? We can best serve the world from an altruistic standpoint by producing our own food. The American market belongs to the American farmer. The Committee on Agriculture should write a sugar program that will provide for the maximum domestic production of sugar. Our increased production of sugar beets in the irrigated West will be welcomed and in the interests of the country.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD].

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, we have had a clear-cut demonstration here this afternoon of how the President of the United States did relieve this body of mental and perhaps emotional stress and debate amongst ourselves when the President removed controls on numerous things without us having to pass upon them here on the floor of the House, whether it be meat, butter, or anything else. If we had had to pass on those controls, we would have had the same kind of debate with respect to any particular commodity as we have had here on sugar this afternoon. So we can be thankful to the President of the United States because on his own initiative he removed certain controls following the November 5 election and thus took such matters out of the hands of this body.

Secondly, I am going to say something very bluntly here. I am going to talk to you as politicians, Democrats and Republicans. Do you want to decontrol sugar in an election year, a Presidential election year, on March 31 or June 30 or October 31? If you do, go ahead and do it. I am not going to vote for that kind of proposition. That is just about as blunt as I can say it. Many people would say, "That bird is certainly a low-down politician of the first order." I am just being practical about this and realistic about it.

Vote to decontrol sugar on March 31, 1948, and assuming your arguments here are reasonably correct in that the price of sugar is going to rapidly advance, then go home next spring and summer and face the housewives of this country and let them pull the hair out of your head if you have any left—I do not have much left for them to pull. You just try that. Vote to decontrol sugar on March 31, 1948, at the beginning of the heavy sugar consumer period of the year 1948 and as the crops are vanishing on the market and you will take the most encouraging step you ever took in your life to send sugar to 25 or 35 cents a pound, which the housewives of this country will probably have to pay. The time of decontrolling of any commodity is just as important as the matter of decontrol itself. Get that fixed in your minds. If you want to set the natural forces of an economy against the spirit of inflation and speculation, then decontrol as of the date the heavy consuming is over and as of the date the heavy production comes into the market. That is exactly the date selected by this committee, namely, October 31, 1947, and which date I favor.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. In just a moment. If you are not going to decontrol October 31, 1947, I am telling you now you had better not decontrol until 1949. How many of you want to keep controls on sugar until 1949? That is as plain as I can say it.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. GAVIN. What assurance can the gentleman give us that the other body will accept the date you have mentioned?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am not responsible for the other body, and in no way do I speak for them. I simply point this out: If you will send to the document room, you will get the report of the committee in the other body, in which they have reported a bill. I have a copy of it before me, Senate Joint Resolution 58. In that they set March 31, 1948, as decontrol period. Why they set it at that date God only knows. I am not speaking politically in that statement. I am speaking because every natural economic argument that can possibly be brought up by anybody—and I will challenge anybody on it—is against decontrol as of March 31. Let me show you why.

Mr. BANTA. That would be any year?

Mr. CRAWFORD. That would be any year. Here is the gentleman from California, or Oregon, or Washington, where sugar is produced; you put control on his farmers who start harvesting their sugar in July or August, and you hold that control until March 31, until they have sold all of their sugar; what assurance do you think he has got of coming back to Congress after a situation like that?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. When is your heavy consuming period on sugar? It runs from about April 1 until about November 1. That is when the people are drawing sugar for every use imaginable in this country in the biggest volume they can get their hands on.

What do you can after November 1, what do you preserve after November 1 of any consequence? Most of your candy for the Christmas trade has been made at that time and is moving into the channels of trade for Christmas distribution. Along about this time, March 15, you are at the lowest consuming period. Then about April 1 you are approaching the beginning of the heavy consuming period. November to April 1 is your low consumption. When do the sugar stocks go onto the market? They come onto the market starting in California in late August or September, and they move across toward the Atlantic seaboard—I am speaking of domestic sugar now—they come into the eastern area, and your heavy domestic continental production comes on in October, November, and December. Before those stocks are exhausted sugars begin to sweep in from Cuba, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands. You are meshing the heavy flow with the low consumption, which says to the speculator, "You had better go slow on speculation, because you may have to carry that sugar a long time, with markets operating as they do sometimes." Your banker may call you up and say to you, "You had better unload some of that sugar. The price might break." The Federal Reserve Board says to the banks, "Do not supply too many credits for speculative loans at this particular time." So October 31 is the date you mesh your low consumption with high production, and dampen down the speculative spirits of your people. Now, go to March 31 again. Your low-consumption period is about past. You are moving into the high-consuming period. Your heavy production is coming to a close. Who holds the sugar, primarily, for the next 5 or 6 months? Cuba. Cuba can wring the purse strings of every housewife in this country during the period April 1 until September or October, when beet sugar is in heavy supply. If you want to go through a summer like that next year, go ahead and do it, but you remember I told you you had better not do it.

Now, this bill says to the people of this country, "Put your sugar house in order." These controls go off next October 31. You will undoubtedly get one from the other body which says March 31. You will have to compromise somewhere or you will have to stand pat, so you had better look out for a roll call on this proposition and you had better make up your mind what you are going to do before you start voting. The committee report from the other body has put in some very strong language. Unless you know sugar you may get your feet tangled up in the bullrushes and get some burs under your arm too. You have got every housewife in the United States wondering what you are going to do about these sugar controls. If I had my way about it as sugar administrator, I would take the tonnage of sugar that is allocated to the United States and I would say to the housewives of this country, "You are going to have a certain percentage of that." I would be quite liberal in that. Having decided the percentages which the housewives are going to get, I would allocate the balance of it to manufacturing consumers of this country and I would not confer a proprietary right on any fellow, it does not make any difference what his historical background is. Mr. A has as much right to operate a business as Mr. B. I would not use the force of the Federal Government to set up Mr. B in business and confer on him any proprietary right exclusive of all of the others.

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. JENNINGS. What the gentleman is saying, boiled down to one sentence, is that we had better pass this bill and not monkey with something the outcome of which we cannot foresee.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes. And I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BUCK].

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, in view of all the circumstances, I favor the enactment of this legislation.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL].

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Chairman, my interpretation of this bill is that it will give the Secretary of Agriculture an opportunity to show that he is fair-minded in the adoption of a policy which should give the American housewife more sugar. On several occasions when he came before our committee he indicated that more sugar would be available this year. Of course, I went on record long ago as wanting a larger ration of sugar for everybody. I, for one, hope that he makes good his pledge in allowing the average housewife more sugar. Every family ought to have at least 25 pounds more right off the bat.

If there was ever an instance of wastage of food it is certainly at the present time when the farmers and the rank and file of city folks are not able to utilize the food they have been able to gather and purchase by preserving it and do a number of different things with it for which sugar is vitally necessary. I, for one, hope the Department of Agriculture will be more fair in allocating and allotting sugar than the agencies which have been empowered with that duty heretofore. That is the reason I am going along with this legislation today.

Just after the last election a friend of mine of long standing took me by the lapel and said: "This Congress has an opportunity to satisfy and satiate the people of America in correcting this No. 1 fiasco that has been foisted upon the American people — the regulation of sugar."

As elected officials we have the chance now to correct this situation. Give the housewife more sugar and we will all be a lot happier.

There are some who feel this bill leaves too much control of sugar in Government hands. Actually there is just enough to keep big buyers from cornering all our sugar supply, at the same time giving the average civilian and the small businessman a chance to obtain an adequate amount.

The responsibility now rests upon the Secretary of Agriculture. He can give the American people a break if he wants to by assuring us all a fairer distribution of one of the most necessary of all food items—sugar.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I sought this time to ask for some information from the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT].

The conclusion of the committee includes the following statement on page 10 of the committee report:

> The committee has further recommended that the Secretary of Agriculture in the administration of the allocation program shall provide for the needs of hardship cases, and for the needs of new users and those having no base-period history. It feels that with the increased sugar available during 1947, over 1946, for industrial users that the reasonable needs of new users, and the reasonable relief of hardship cases including provision of sugar to prevent the wastage of mill and other food products, must be provided for by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Iowa City, Iowa, is the home of the State University of Iowa. It is a city of approximately 18,000 to 20,000 people. The university enrollment has leaped to more than 10,000 students this year and will go even higher next year, whereas the attendance heretofore has been between 6,000 and 7,000 students. Many hundreds of these additional students are married and have brought their wives and children with them. Under present law adequate provision has not been made for the needs of this increase in population.

My question is: Does this provision in this bill as interpreted in the committee report authorize the Secretary of Agriculture and give him the power and responsibility to make adequate provision for the needs of greatly increased populations in such communities as Iowa City?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I do not know that the bill provides adequately for such a situation any more than under short supply you could make adequate provision for anybody in the United States; but as far as those people are concerned, they would be considered either hardship cases, or rather, let me put it this way, the distributors under those circumstances may make application for increased quotas to meet the demand occasioned by any increase in population. That in itself should be considered a hardship case which the Secretary of Agriculture would have to recognize under the conditions of this act.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. He has that responsibility, but that has not been the case under existing law.

Mr. WOLCOTT. He will have that responsibility from now on; yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. JENSEN].

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Chairman, I am quite sure that every Member of this House will agree with me that the primary reason why we find ourselves in this sugar crisis is due to the fact that the price of sugar beets and sugarcane has been held down too low in comparison to other farm products. About a month ago the Governor of the Virgin Islands testified before the Subcommittee on Appropriations for the Department of the Interior, at which time I asked him what would happen to the production of sugar in the Virgin Islands if they were permitted to have an increased price of, say, $2 a hundred on their raw sugar. He said, "We would produce approximately 25 percent more sugar." If the OPA had in the past few years permitted a more reasonable comparative price for sugarcane and sugar beets this problem would not confront us today.

If I had my way we would decontrol sugar right now, or at least permit the price to rise sufficiently to get the necessary production everywhere.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from California [Mr. FLETCHER].

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Banking and Currency Committee having heard the extensive hearings on sugar, I wish to say that I am very much in favor of the passage of House Joint Resolution 146, by Chairman WOLCOTT.

In my considered opinion, the best testimony of qualified witneses proved that the month of October was the best month to decontrol sugar. With sugar production in 1947 at a high level, I can see no reason to defer decontrol until 1948.

We have seen the pitiful spectacle in this country of the loss of milk, fruit, and other foods, considerable of which have been wasted because of the inability of housewives and new users to obtain sugar. I do not think it is fair to continue to give a monopoly to the present industrial users of sugar. Why should new enterprise be discouraged? Let us not forget that sugar is only one of the many problems in our present economy. I call your attention to increasing unemployment in many parts of our country which could be alleviated by the starting of new enterprises. Our business history is replete with stories of the growth of large corporations from small business beginnings.

House Joint Resolution 146 allows the Secretary of Agriculture to control sugar until October 31, 1947; it allows sugar for hardship cases and new-user cases; and provides inventory controls against hoarding until March 31, 1948. I strongly urge the passage of House Joint Resolution 146.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LARCADE].

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the resolution under consideration, and usually I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DOMENGEAUX], in matters connected with the sugar industry, since he represents the Sugar Bowl district of Louisiana, and I therefore join him in urging favorable action on this bill.

The compromises effected under this resolution in committee are now satisfactory to the producers of sugar in Louisiana, and in that connection I wish to submit copy of a telegram from the officers of the Louisiana Sugarcane League of Louisiana, as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, LA., March 20, 1947.

C. J. BOURG,
Union Trust Building,
Washington, D. C.:

Reference decontrol of sugar, have contacted membership, executive and legislative committees. Overwhelming majority opinion strongly endorse definite and complete decontrol sugar October 31, 1947. This action taken in interest of 11,000 sugarcane growers who would suffer irreparable damage if decontrol is made effective March 31 instead of October 31, 1947. Kindly advise Louisiana congressional delegation of the position of our industry.

GEORGE L. BILLEAUD,
President.
MURPHY J. FOSTER,
Chairman, Legislative Commitee.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, there are no further requests for time on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no further requests for time, under the rule the Clerk will read the committee amendment which will be considered as an original bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

That (a) notwithstanding any other provisions of law, the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, (56 Stat. 23); the Stabilization Act, 1942 (56 Stat. 765); title III of the Second War Powers Act, 1942 (56 Stat. 177), and the amendment to existing law made thereby; title XIV of the Second War Powers Act, 1942 (56 Stat. 177); and section 6 of the act of July 2, 1940 (54 Stat. 714), all as amended and extended, shall continue in effect with respect to sugar to and including October 31, 1947, except that authority to continue inventory controls may be exercised to and including March 31, 1948: Provided, however, That—

(1) the authority contained herein shall not be deemed (i) to permit the allocation or rationing of any product (other than the allocation of such product imported or brought into the continental United States) unless a regulation providing for allocation or rationing thereof was in effect on February 18, 1947, or (ii) to permit price control over any product unless a price-control regulation with respect thereto was in effect on February 18, 1947;

(2) no person shall be subject to any criminal penalty or civil liability, under any such provision of law, on account of any act or omission which is made unlawful by section 4 of this act;

(3) sections 203 and 204 of the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, as amended, shall not apply in the case of any regulation or order hereafter issued in the exercise of any power, function, or duty transferred by section 3 (a) of this Act; and

(4) hereafter no person shall be required to secure a license, and no license shall be issued to any person, under section 205 of the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, as amended, for the purpose of providing for the enforcement of any regulation or order relating to sugar.

(b) Notwithstanding the provisions of any other law, the Secretary of Agriculture, in exercising the allocation and rationing authority transferred to him by section 3 of this act, shall, in a manner consistent with the maintenance of an effective national allocation and rationing program, provide for the needs of hardship cases, for the needs of new sugar users, and for the needs of those who have no base period history.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOLCOTT: On page 6, line 17, after "controls", insert "over other than household users."

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I have called attention earlier in the debate to the desirability of clarifying this language and, I believe, expressed the fear that unless it was clarified we might unintentionally continue controls over all users through March 31, 1948. It surely was not the intent of the committee when we authorized the continuance of inventory controls to include the householder. It has been suggested that this amendment is the easiest way to clarify it, that is, to restrict it to commercial and industrial users. If we were to use language that it was restricted to industrial and commercial users, of course we would have to define what is a commercial or industrial user, but it is very clear that the inventory controls, if they are going to be continued, should be continued as to everyone but the housewife, the household user. Therefore, probably the most direct approach to the problem is this that by eliminating the household users we include thereby all other users. It is in the interest of assuring that the controls over the allocation of sugar to the housewife for household uses will expire on October 31, 1947, that I believe this amendment should be adopted.

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. CHENOWETH. Do I correctly understand that it is the position of the chairman of the committee that the Secretary should have the authority to ration industrial and commercial users until March 31, 1948?

Mr. WOLCOTT. According to action taken by the committee the inventory control could be exercised to and including March 31, 1948. Believing that it is the intention of the committee to limit inventory controls to industrial and commercial users, I have offered this language to exempt household users, to clarify the intention of the committee in that respect. As I have said, I am afraid that otherwise the Secretary of Agriculture might be justified in interpreting this language to mean that he would have the authority to exercise controls over the amount of sugar the housewife might have in her sugar bowl.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. In other words, Government departments have never yet brought inventory controls down to the household?

Mr. WOLCOTT. That is right.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The gentleman's amendment makes the language clear, that there is no intent here that the Secretary of Agriculture shall fuss around with what is in the house?

Mr. WOLCOTT. That is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It is to restrict it definitely to commercial users?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I think the amendment is very proper.

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. CHENOWETH. Would the gentleman have any objection to ending all controls on October 31? Is not that the purpose of this bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes; I think I do have some objection to that.

Mr. CHENOWETH. I intend to offer an amendment when this amendment is disposed of.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I shall have an opportunity to explain my objection when the gentleman offers his amendment.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, we have no objection to the amendment and think it should be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOLCOTT:

On page 7, strike out lines 7 to 11, inclusive, and insert the following paragraphs:

"(3) no provision of section 204 (d) or (e) of the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, as amended, shall apply (i) in any proceeding, involving a regulation or order with respect to sugar, in which an injunction or other order of a court is hereafter applied for, or (ii) in any proceeding under section 37 of the Criminal Code, which is based on a conspiracy involving any act or omission which is made unlawful by section 4 of this act;

"(4) in the case of any regulation or order with respect to sugar, no protest may be hereafter filed under section 203 of the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, as amended."

In line 12, strike out "(4)" and insert "(5)."

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, this language is suggested by the legislative counsel to more clearly define what is intended. It is intended by the language in section 3 on page 7 to do away with the protest procedure now provided for in the Emergency Price Control Act with respect to violations or procedure after the effective date of the bill now under consideration.

It is our intention under this bill to eliminate the Emergency Court of Appeals in the participation in the reviews of violations under this particular bill. The Emergency Court of Appeals was set up to handle a situation which might arise wherein, because of a multiplicity of suits involving hundreds of thousands of commodities, chaos might result from even trying to enforce the price control laws.

At the time the OPA was administering controls over hundreds of thousands of commodities, it was essential, and you will recall that many of us predicted it here on the floor for some years. But there is no longer any need for continuing the cumbersome machinery under which these reviews are made in respect to price control regulations because the activity of the OPA is now pretty much narrowed. After the effective date of this act the OPA and the machinery for the enforcement of OPA regulations will no longer be in existence in respect to sugar controls and they should not be continued after the effective date of this bill because there would then be a conflict of jurisdiction.

As I stated before, the legislative counsel has suggested this language which I have offered to define more clearly our intent. In other words, he puts it in somewhat better language from the legislative point of view.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CHENOWETH: On page 6, line 16, after the figure "1947", strike out the remainder of the line 16 and all of lines 17 and 18 to the word "provided."

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be considerable confusion over the meaning of the provision I am seeking to strike from the bill by the amendment I have offered. No one can tell the House just what control the Secretary of Agriculture will have over sugar after October 31, 1947. My amendment will stop all controls over sugar on October 31 of this year.

The bill before the House has for its purpose the termination of the sugar rationing program, including the control of prices over sugar, as of October 31, 1947. My amendment, if adopted, will leave no doubt as to the effect of the bill.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD] who addressed the House a few minutes ago, and who is an authority on sugar, made a strong argument for the amendment that I have offered. It is admitted that no one knows what the Secretary of Agriculture would do with this power to continue inventory controls. I have never heard it satisfactorily explained why he should have these powers. It is conceded that October 31 is the proper date to decontrol sugar, as we will then have a full inventory of sugar. This is the period when the candy manufacturers of the country will be anxious to make some Christmas candy. I am not particularly happy about the proposal that the Secretary of Agriculture, or any other Government official, should have the power to say how much sugar any industrial user of sugar should have on hand. I am thinking of the small candy makers, bakeries, soft drink bottlers, ice cream plants, and others affected. I want to see them get adequate sugar, which I am sure will be available. They are certainly entitled to this consideration.

Unless my amendment is adopted, I submit that you are giving the Secretary of Agriculture full power to continue the sugar program for industrial and commercial users until March 31, 1948. The control of inventories is all that he needs to regulate all industrial users of sugar.

We virtually continue the rationing of sugar until March 31, 1948, so far as these commercial users are concerned. I am opposed to any such extension.

Mr. Chairman, I am disappointed that we have to pass this legislation at all. I am ready to support this bill and continue the sugar program until October 31, the date set by the committee, but I am not willing to leave a loophole whereby sugar rationing of any type can be continued beyond that date. Congress should determine when sugar controls will be abolished and not leave this decision up to the Secretary of Agriculture, or anyone else.

I am seeking to strike the following language from the bill:

That authority to continue inventory controls may be exercised to and including March 31, 1948.

The gentleman from Michigan, the chairman of the committee, considered this language so broad and far-reaching that he offered the amendment eliminating housewives from being included under these inventory controls. However, this provision still applies to all other users of sugar, and in effect continues controls until March 31 of next year. In other words, instead of abandoning sugar rationing and controls on October 31, as we have been led to believe was the purpose of this legislation, we are in fact extending controls over certain users of sugar for 6 months beyond that date.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that we should adopt my amendment. I hope it will have your approval and that we will end all sugar controls on October 31, 1947. The Secretary of Agriculture should have no inventory control or any other jurisdiction beyond that date. The only logical and reasonable conclusion we can draw from the discussion and debate this afternoon is that it is the purpose of this bill to end all sugar controls on October 31. I know the committee has given careful consideration to the entire sugar situation and is recommending the continuation of rationing and price control a few months longer. Personally, I do not believe the dire predictions of those who contend that chaos would result if these controls were removed at this time. I still have faith in the ability of our producers and distributors of sugar to see that a fair distribution is made. However, I am willing to continue price ceilings on sugar for a few months longer, but I certainly want to protest against the continuation of all controls over sugar, whether by the inventory method or some other ruse, beyond October 31 of this year. Let us make up our minds whether we want to terminate sugar control on October 31, 1947, or on March 31 next year. It seems to me the consensus of opinion is that it should come to an end on October 31, this year. If that is true, let us say so in plain language; in language that those administering sugar controls will understand. In order to avoid confusion and remove all doubt of our intention I urge the adoption of my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. CHENOWETH] has expired.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, earlier this afternoon in the general debate I spoke out without qualification in favor of the October 31, 1947, date, as the best date for the removal of controls on rationing and price. However, I feel that if we were to adopt the amendment that has just been suggested by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. CHENOWETH], which would remove inventory controls as of that date, it would be almost impossible to decontrol sugar as of October 31, 1947. I say that advisedly. This fact must be borne in mind: While on October 31, 1947, we will know exactly what the sugar supply will be for 1948, we still will not have the sugar stocks on hand, so that we still must wait a period of months before the crops from the Virgin Islands, Puerto Rico, and Cuba start reaching the mainland. If we were to decontrol as of October 31, 1947, on the inventory, we would have the same mad scramble among the big industrial producers that we might anticipate if we decontrol as of this date or as of March 31, 1947.

In addition to that, the amendment just offered by our distinguished chairman [Mr. WOLCOTT] very well clarifies the intent of this bill so that the people we principally want to help, that is, the housewives of America, will not be affected by inventory control. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT] would adequately protect the housewives as of October 31, 1947. But if we remove inventory controls and allow the big industrial users, who occupy a favored financial position, to go out and buy up the most outrageous inventories, then the price of sugar is bound to skyrocket. There are only four or five gigantic sugar users in the United States when you talk about big sugar users. If you put them in a position where they can buy large inventories, then the price of sugar will skyrocket beyond what the gentleman predicted a little while ago, and we are bound to have what the gentleman said, an effort on the part of those who want to continue controls to come back and say to us, "See what happened. Let us put the controls on again."

Therefore, I hope the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. CHENOWETH. In effect, the gentleman is arguing now to continue it.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. No; I am not.

Mr. CHENOWETH. Practically, what you say continues the rationing of industrial sugar until March 31, 1948.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. No; it does not.

Mr. CHENOWETH. If you control the inventory you control everything.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. No. The committee amendment is very specific. The housewives will not be affected by the inventory control.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. I am glad to yield to my distinguished fellow committeeman.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Without inventory control to March 31, 1948, of course, the housewives would get less sugar.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Exactly.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Industrial users will hoard the sugar.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Exactly.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. They certainly will not be placed in a favorable position by this amendment.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. The gentleman is correct. The result will be that the industrial users will hoard all the sugar and the housewives get none of the sugar, and those who want to continue control of sugar will be able to come down here and make out a good case.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. CHENOWETH].

Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the debate here today on sugar, and the committee have reported out a very fine bill. I feel, however, that all controls on sugar should be definitely eliminated on October 31, 1947. In the past we have listened to discussions as to the decontrol of oil, then we listened to discussion on the decontrol of meats and the dire consequences in event of decontrol but nothing happened. Now it is this emergency and that emergency—always an emergency. The time has now come when the American people are asking relief from restrictions and regulations controlling and strangling business, restrictions and regulations that have killed the free flow of trade. I am asking the Members of this House whether we are going to degenerate this Government into some sort of bureaucratically controlled government, or are we going to return to free enterprise, placing the business of the country in the hands of the American people where it rightfully belongs? It is time to end all controls. There are 140,000,000 people in this Nation and we built without question the greatest productivity the world has ever known. Let me tell you, Mr. Chairman, it was not built by control, restriction and Government regulation. It was built by the American way. It was built by initiative, courage, determination, energy, resourcefulness and hard work, we have built a great producing Nation of agriculture and industry, the envy of all the world. Let us now discontinue these controls that are strangling the free flow of trade and crucifying our system of free enterprise. Further controls are unnecessary and should be discontinued.

I am going to support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word and ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for 8 minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, let us once and for all clear up the question as to how the International Emergency Food Council is given the power to put the sugar produced and acquired by the United States into an international pool and thence ration out of that pool back to the United States an amount of sugar it determines to be our proper share, and let there be no equivocation about it.

Referring specifically to the source of the power exercised by the International Emergency Food Council to assume this function, I asked Mr. James H. Marshall, Director of the Sugar Branch of the Department of Agriculture, to state specifically who has the power to bind the United States to this international program and whether legal authority existed for it. He replied that the power is vested in the President and the authority for it exists in title III of the Second War Powers Act.

However, I am informed by counsel, the most competent on the Hill, that Mr. Marshall is mistaken in his position; that the authority which the President exercises in delegating to the International Emergency Food Council the power to place American sugar in a world pool and arbitrarily allocate back to us whatever it believes we are entitled to is not provided in article 3 of the Second War Powers Act, and that they can find no specific authority for it.

Now, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT], chairman of the committee, has made a statement that this power is somehow inherent in the President's powers to conduct the foreign affairs of the Nation. I want to challenge that statement. I do not believe the Constitution ever intended to vest any such power as we are here considering in the President of the United States. If the President has authority to exercise, or delegate to an international body the power to tell the people of the United States what portion of the sugar they produce and acquire must be exported to other nations and what part they may be permitted to consume themselves, then the President of the United States has the power to do this with respect to every other article we produce in the United States. Now, who is going to rise in his place and say the President of the United States has that power under the Constitution?

I pause. I want to see if there is any one on this floor who will rise in his or her place and say that the President of the United States has this power under the Constitution. No one rises and, of course, none can.

What I want to get across to the Congress and to the country is that even though all control over domestic rationing of sugar is repealed, we will still have rationing by the body known as the International Emergency Food Council, and that except for that international arrangement the people of the United States today would probably have all the sugar they want.

Let us tell the people the truth. They should know why they are unable to get more sugar and they should know that the blame for this is upon the Congress of the United States. Congress has the power to correct this condition.

One more point. The attempt is being made to give the impression there is nothing compulsory about this international arrangement, that the international group is only an advisory body. Whether that is true or not it has nothing to do with the question I am raising. The point I make is that the President of the United States has no power under the Constitution that authorizes him to accept any recommendation made by the International Emergency Food Council or to deal in any manner with an international body to set up this scheme.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. The gentleman does not take the position that any sugars produced in the United States are sent to foreign countries, does he?

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Oh, no. I simply say that the sugar we produce and the sugar we acquire is placed into an international pool, and from that pool is allocated back to the United States by this international body whatever amount of sugar it believes proper.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. I wish to say that the sugar produced in the Hawaiian Islands, the Philippine Islands, Puerto Rico, and the United States is consumed in this country and not sent to foreign countries. It is true that we do purchase all the sugar in Cuba. It is contracted for in order to keep down unjust amounts to be paid for the sugar, with the understanding that we will allot out of that amount a certain portion to foreign countries, like old customers of Cuba, but the sugar produced here as well as in Hawaii and Puerto Rico is consumed here and none of this sugar is sent abroad.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. The gentleman's argument is entirely beside the point. What I stated is a plain simple fact and it is there for anyone to see who cares to.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. FOLGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, we on the Committee on Banking and Currency have been listening to witness after witness. Most every problem of our economy has been represented by the testimony that has been given. I want to pay a tribute to the large users of sugar, in all cases except one, in that they favored the bill as presented by the chairman of the committee in the first instance, to which I am adhering in thought. I really believe that when we substituted another bill for it we made a mistake. But if we add to that the lifting of inventory controls on the 31st of October instead of extending them to March 31, 1948, the result, in my opinion, will be that the small users of sugar and the housewives of this country will find no sugar. It will all be taken by the large purchasers who are able to pay higher prices and have easier access to making sugar contracts. This will be an absolute disaster to the housewives and the small users of sugar in this country, in my judgment, which I have formed from listening carefully to about 100 people.

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLGER. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. CHENOWETH. In one breath the gentleman praises the large industrial users of sugar and in the next breath he expresses a suspicion that they will deprive all the rest of the country of sugar.

Mr. FOLGER. They admitted that they could get it, but they did not want the opportunity and did not want to get into a scramble for it.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLGER. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Is it not a fact that all the large industrial users asked us to continue inventory controls until March 31?

Mr. FOLGER. Except one. The gentleman remembers that one, does he not?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I think we have to be realistic about the situation. I do not think anyone desires to see these war controls come off any sooner than I. I think the position of many of us is pretty well known, that it is our purpose to take them off as quickly as we can with as little shock to our economy as possible. This bill as it is written at the present time would authorize and provide for gradual decontrol, with little or no shock to our economy, and with little or no economic or political shocks which might be incident to or the result of taking them off prematurely.

I would rather put myself in the position of encouraging somebody else, some administrator, to take the responsibility for not getting sugar to the housewife after October 31 than I would take it myself. Surely the only harm is going to be possible harm to the housewife following October 31. No one else can be harmed by the continuance of inventory controls except the housewife. We are confronted with this problem. If the housewife is harmed by reason of industrial users operating in open competition with her; if inventories held by industrial and commercial users are built exceptionally high in October, November, and December against demand for candies, beverages, and everything else that is made of sugar, incident to the Christmas trade, I want the fault to lie in the administration of the law and not in the legislation itself. By October 31 people will be looking to December 25. The period between November 1 and Christmas is a period in which industrial and commercial users probably make, distribute, and market more candy than they do in any other period of the year.

Of course, there will be a tendency for them to, regardless of price, bid up every pound of available sugar on October 31 before the beet crop comes on the market, and, I believe, before the cane crop comes on the market, at a time when the inventories may be somewhat lower than you now expect them to be, because of a partial failure of the Cuban crop and because of a partial failure of the Hawaiian or Puerto Rican crop. We do not have any assurances that they are going to be up to the estimates, but surely we want to provide a hedge against crop failures to the point where the housewife is going to be assured of her proportionate share, her just and equitable share of sugar after October 31 and until such time as the new crops do come in. The only way I can see for us to do it and give her assurance that she is going to get her equitable share of these stocks is to give somebody the authority to tell the industrial users that they shall not at any time have more than a certain amount of sugar on hand in their inventories.

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. CHENOWETH. The gentleman is telling the House now that you are not discontinuing the rationing of industrial sugar on October 31, but are going to continue it until March 31? No other conclusion can be drawn from the gentleman's statement.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I think the gentleman is correct. I may say to the gentleman that my bill originally provided for the continuance of these controls until March 1, 1948. I think I had a pretty good provision in the bill. I provided that the Secretary of Agriculture before October 15 would make his finding in respect of the necessity for continuing the controls after October 31. If he made this finding according to certain standards which we set up in the bill, then he could continue them, even the inventory controls, beyond October 31, but not later than March 31. I think that is better language, but in my opinion on the basis of the practical situation we must defeat the amendment which the gentleman has offered.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT] may proceed for three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I have asked for this time so that I could ask my chairman a question. Let us be fair to everybody about this and let us be clear about it. If the Government of the United States says to corporation A, "We no longer have any control over the amount of sugar you use but are simply going to say you must not have on hand more than 5,000 bags at any one time," in doing that the Federal Government does not limit the amount of sugar that can be used and, therefore, the Federal Government does not restrict the quantity of sugar that the corporation can use or exercise rationing power. It is an inventory control power—an inventory beyond which you cannot go. Does my chairman agree with that proposition?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I must admit that the inventory controls contemplated after that date would not be as restrictive as the controls under the power which the Secretary of Agriculture will have up to October 31. If the Secretary of Agriculture by regulation says that this corporation A, to which the gentleman has referred, shall not have more than 30 days' supply of sugar on hand at any one time in his inventory, of course, there is little to prevent that corporation A from sending its employees out into the open market and picking up 5 pounds at a time here and there for the corporation's use. That is, at least some restriction on this practice and that is some guaranty that the housewife is going to get her equitable allotment of this sugar.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. CHENOWETH].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CHENOWETH) there were—ayes 30, noes 115.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GAMBLE: On page 7, line 24, after the word "history", insert a new subdivision (c):

"Nothing herein shall restrict the import of products of consumer size containers of not more than 3 pounds net each or more than one-half United States liquid gallons each, providing importers of such products shall obtain certification from the proper Government officials of the exporting country that products so shipped shall have been produced out of domestic quota sugar."

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. Chairman, during the war certain American-owned companies at the request of the United States Army and with priorities granted by the United States Army, I am informed set up production facilities in Cuba for the production of certain food products, required by the Army, particularly guava jelly, to get vitamin C for the Army. They have now converted these facilities to the peacetime production of civilian consumer food products and are at the present time manufacturing jellies, jams, and certain types of sirups.

Cuba has been allocated out of the 1947 crop of sugar 740,000 tons, for Cuba's domestic use and for trading purposes with various South and Central American or other countries. Testimony before the committee disclosed that approximately 150,000 tons of this sugar is necessary for direct domestic sugar consumption in Cuba. This leaves a surplus of 590,000 tons available for sale, manufacture, and conversion, through consumer products, during the year 1947. This surplus is equivalent to over a billion pounds of refined sugar. Where does this sugar go? Some of it comes into the United States ex-quota in the form of jellies and jams, but due to import restrictions here in the United States, and an attempt to prevent diversion and maldistribution to industrial users in the United States, a great portion of this available tonnage of sugar-containing products goes to Europe and other foreign markets ex-quota.

The amendment which I have offered will give to the American consumer a part of this tonnage in sugar products now going to other countries. We cannot get all of it, naturally. Some of it is and must be sold and/or traded by Cuba for products necessary for her economy. In order to stabilize labor conditions, combat agitation, and control the inflationary spiral, the Cuban Government has planned to sell a part of this sugar for the manufacture of sugar products in Cuba at a cost to the purchaser of 2 or 3 cents above the low favored American price for raw sugar.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GAMBLE. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. As I understand it, this product that the gentleman is proposing to have shipped into this country is made out of sugar that is retained in Cuba or some other country and is not chargeable to the amount of sugar, that is, the quota that is turned over to the United States for American consumption?

Mr. GAMBLE. That is correct. It has no connection with the United States quota. It has only to do with the quota allocated to Cuba out of the Cuban production. Ex-quota, I believe they call it.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Of course, that would apply to other products. Beverage companies could buy their sirup, made out of that same Cuban sugar quota, and ship the sirup into the United States without having it charged to the American quota?

Mr. GAMBLE. Yes; ex-quota if they bought the sugar at a price over the price the United States pays for the sugar. But under the terms of this amendment they could only buy it for export in small containers of not more than 3 pounds each which would not be commercially or economically sound.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Should an American citizen go to Cuba or Mexico and buy 10 or 15 pounds of sugar, does the gentleman's amendment provide that that sugar can be brought into the United States without surrendering ration stamps?

Mr. GAMBLE. No; it has nothing to do with that situation, but I know it is being done right now. That is, sugar is being brought into this country by American citizens without producing ration stamps.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. No. You cannot do it now.

Mr. GAMBLE. You can if you take the chance and get away with it.

But let me finish, if I may.

The money obtained from these sugar sales is used by the Cuban Government to purchase foodstuffs for the Cuban population.

Here is a potential supply of sugar for consumer use such as sirups and other low-cost items, and it would go far toward relieving the pressure on the American consumer for additional sugar. Testimony before the committee states that at least 250,000 tons of this sugar can be readily released for the manufacture of sugar-containing products and sirups for shipment to the United States. Reduced to simple terms this means that every American family would be able to obtain and purchase at least 12 pounds more of sugar products and sirups during the next 7 to 9 months of peak demand. It only requires that import permits be granted by the United States for that purpose. At the present time jellies, preserved fruits, coconut, and so forth, made in Cuba out of the Cuban sugar quota, are now shipped into the United States with permits. They are made by these same companies. These sirups are now on the restricted list of sugar-containing items which are prohibited from being imported under the regulations of the Sugar Branch, Department of Agriculture. I believe this is discriminatory under War Food Order No. 63. This order has been issued on the theory of some economists in the Department, that if this surplus of Cuban-manufactured sirups, on quota, were allowed to come into this country it would upset our economy. I repeat, the Department believes, apparently, that jams and jellies will not upset our economy but that sirups will. It just does not make sense.

This amendment would allow these sugar-containing products and sirups to be imported.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GAMBLE] not so much by what he had to say with reference to Cuban products but by the effect that amendment will have on products produced by citizens of the United States, residents of Puerto Rico. By that I mean the Puerto Ricans. Puerto Rico is a sugar-producing area. There is allocated to Puerto Rico for household and industrial uses a given tonnage of sugar. We allow Puerto Rico to say how that shall be used. They make their own division down there between household and industrial users. It does not affect directly the quota of sugar allowed to the people of the United States.

If Mr. A, a Puerto Rican, takes that sugar and puts it into citron, sugared citron by preserving it, or candied citrus peel, fruits, we will call it, and sends the citrus peel or the citron to the United States, you receive it here in the form of candied products; it gives you sugar in that form and actually adds to your sugar supply just as this proposition would add to your sugar supply as it comes out of the quota assigned to Cuba under the Cuban sugar contract between Cuba and the United States.

Keep this in mind, Puerto Rico is an insular possession of the United States. We have got to underwrite the insular treasury. We send millions and tens of millions of dollars to Puerto Rico in the form of relief funds. Why under the sun do we refuse to let Puerto Rico take their sunshine and their natural fruits and peels and sugar them with the sugar they produce there, convert it through industrial processes, give their people employment, put it into the form to which I have referred, and then say to them they cannot send it to the United States without surrendering sugar stamps? This fight is up now between the Department of Agriculture and the Committee on Insular Affairs, and we are trying to induce the Department of Agriculture and OPA to let the sugar products produced by American citizens in Puerto Rico come into this country without our wholesalers or jobbers being forced to surrender sugar stamps.

The gentleman's amendment has been argued in favor of Cuba. Let the Cuban people do likewise if they want to take their sugar now and put it into preserves, jellies, and jams and send it to us, let them do it, and do not charge them sugar stamps. That is the point the gentleman is making, and with that I agree. But if you people want to protect the taxpayers of the United States with respect to sending relief funds to Puerto Rico, get hold of Mr. Marshall at the Department of Agriculture Sugar Branch and tell him to let these Puerto Rican products come in here without surrendering sugar stamps on the equivalent sugar in those products when they arrive here in these packages shipped to large industrial users like hotels and restaurants.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. Prior to the holidays I received complaints from retailers in this country that manufacturers of candies and confections in this country could not fill their orders but they could buy foreign-produced candies and so forth.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is correct.

Mr. CURTIS. Will not this amendment offered by the gentleman from New York accentuate that problem?

Mr. CRAWFORD. No, it does not accentuate it for the reason that in the agreement to purchase sugar Cuba reserves the right to allocate to her people for home consumption, industrial and export use, so many tons of sugar, and having made that allocation as of the date we entered the agreement for the purchase of Cuban sugar they have that sugar reserved. If they want to ship that sugar up to us in manufactured products let them do it, paying the tariff, of course; we get that much more sugar.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. HILL. The point I am interested in in this matter we are speaking about of shipping manufactured food products into this country, will these products come up to the standards set by the Food and Drugs Act?

Mr. CRAWFORD. It may or may not, I am not debating that, I cannot answer that. That is up to the control authorities.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPENCE and Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana rose.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield first to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SPENCE].

Mr. SPENCE. This amendment was never considered in the committee. I should like to know what effect it will have. It seems to be a special treatment to particular users. There is an axiom in law that hard cases make bad law. I do not see how we are going to meet all the contingencies that may arise to result in injustices under this act; it seems to me this matter is of sufficient importance that it should have been considered by the committee and testimony taken on it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I now yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOGGS].

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Do I understand this amendment to permit the importation of liquid sugars?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not think so.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Do I understand it to permit the importation of molasses and sirups?

Mr. CRAWFORD. In consumer-sized packages containing sugar chargeable to the reserve quota held back by Cuba. Suppose it did; we are getting the benefit of it.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. But is it not possible, though, by the use, for instance, of the ionic interchange procedure whereby you convert molasses to sugar in a liquid state rather than a granulated state, for the man who has the process to do that to get an advantage over the man who does not?

Mr. CRAWFORD. It is in those small containers for personal use. This debate does not enter into the tariff question whatever. It has to do with the allocation of sugar quotas.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. I am not talking about the tariff question; I am talking about the rationing question. If it is just as easy to use liquid sugar as it is to use granulated sugar, do you not give a man an advantage over his competitors?

Mr. CRAWFORD. But the point is that it is being charged to the Cuban sugar rationing quota, and if you want to give up 5 pounds to that quota and give to me, bring it over, and I will take the sugar.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. But he gets that additional advantage.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Does the gentleman mean the domestic consumer here?

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Or the housewife.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. No; the industrial user.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I did not understand that this covered the industrial user.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, restricting the size of the container would not be advantageous to the industrial user but to the individual.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The economics of it is this; by the time the industrial user acquires those small containers and converts them into his process, the cost will be very prohibitive against the other side of the proposition, at least, I think so.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. MILLER of California. What effect will this have upon the candy manufacturers of this country?

Mr. CRAWFORD. If the local manufacturers use it, that would be up to them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk again read the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. The amendment may possibly have some good purpose, but in the first place it was never considered before our committee, and I think that it has a very definite danger.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GAMBLE. I offered the amendment before the committee, and I discussed it at length. One gentleman appeared before the committee, and it was the last man who testified before the hearings were closed. Unfortunately, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT] and I were the only ones there.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. I apologize to the gentleman.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I withdrew the amendment. There was no vote, but it was offered.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. I am sorry I was not present when it was offered. I want to point out to the House the danger of this type of amendment. In the sugar trade they have recently developed a process whereby you can produce what is called liquid sugar. This bypasses all of the usual procedures of processing and refining. You take your molasses or whatever the base product is and you come out finally with a product that has the same essential chemical ingredients as granulated sugar. I believe, without being too familiar with the amendment, because as I say I was not there when it was discussed before the committee, that this amendment could possibly achieve that result, and if it does that it is invariably going to give the man who has the process and who is able to utilize this method of using sugar an advantage over a man who has to go into the open market and buy granulated sugar, and by the same token it would discriminate against the housewife who must use granulated sugar on the table. Therefore, I think that this amendment has a considerable amount of danger, not having been fully considered, and without knowing just the full implication.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. This amendment, I believe, refers to a 3-pound container. Does the gentleman recall the weight of a 1-gallon container of liquid sugar?

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. No; I do not.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Well, I would not be too certain, but I would guess around about 10 pounds per gallon; in other words, let us think in terms of one-third of a gallon container. Suppose I am a fellow who is using sugar in sirup form in my process, and I import sugar from Cuba in that form in one-third gallon containers, I have got to pay for that special packaging while my competitor can purchase sugar with his ration stamps on a hundred-pound basis; a 100-pound bag, for instance. I would be at an economic disadvantage which, in my humble opinion, I could not possibly overcome.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. I think that is true in normal times, but in these times when demand for sugar products is so tremendous I do not believe it is true. We had an illustration of that in New Orleans about 6 months ago, when the Federal Government auctioned off some ration-free sugar, price-control-free sugar, and it brought 26 cents a pound; so that I believe this amendment might very well work to the competitive advantage of the companies which are able to use liquid sugars in place of granulated sugars. Therefore, I would be inclined to vote against the amendment.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If the gentleman will yield further, the very controls which we now exercise place the producer in a position to put sugar into a product and sell it on the basis of 26 cents per pound sugar equivalent, because the housewife is forced to go to the baker and pay 80 or 90 cents for a pie and a dollar and a quarter for a cake, and those who buy sweetened products that go into ice-cream mix, for instance, are forced to pay the equivalent of 25 or 35 cents a pound for sugar right now. That is the reason I do not get so excited about talking in terms of the price of sugar at 15 cents a pound, and I favor the lower price as against the higher.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. That was exactly my point in my answer to the gentleman a moment ago, when he said that the man who imported the candy sirup would not be able to compete because of the additional cost. I say that in this day and time cost is no consideration. I firmly believe this amendment could give a great competitive advantage. It has been done before. Last year one of the great beverage companies of this country converted thousands and thousands of tons of molasses into liquid sugar and made pop out of it, and did not produce one single ration coupon. This year they stopped that practice. Under this amendment that thing could happen again. I hope the committee will not discriminate in this manner.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GAMBLE].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GAMBLE) there were—ayes 69, noes 62.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, let me compose a direct inquiry to all the Members who are in Committee this afternoon: Have you ever been sued by the Government of the United States? It is not a very pleasant experience. When a United States marshal comes and serves process and makes you the defendant in an action in which the Federal Government is the complainant, you appreciate at once that behind that complaint there is the Treasury of the United States. Uncle Sam never relents. No amount of impatience and no delay in time is going to make a lot of difference when Uncle Sam becomes the complainant in an action against you.

We had many complaints under OPA, thousands of them. Then, one day, thousands of commodities were decontrolled, but the actions at law that were pending were not decontrolled. They are still there.

I sent a note to Mr. Remy, the enforcement officer of OPA, recently, and I found that as of October 31, 1946, there were pending in connection with decontrolled commodities, mind you, for which any action is no longer a violation, 45,131 actions of all kinds against citizens of the United States of America. In addition thereto there were pending 21,624 actions of all kinds with respect to commodities that were still under control. These figures include actions, investigations, anticipated actions, and complaints.

I respectfully submit to the membership this afternoon that when a commodity was decontrolled, why not give the little merchants, the small industrialists, the humble citizen in all the 48 States of the Union, the benefit of the doubt and say, "Now that the commodity has been decontrolled we will also decontrol the action that is pending against you."

As a matter of fact, the OPA is investigating many of them right now because they carry in this summary 4,184 cases that are under investigation. There are 11,022 cases that are awaiting disposition. The number has diminished somewhat since that time, but the net fact is that in every one of the 48 States of the Union there are people who are within the shadow of Uncle Sam's heavy hand and his courts today for something that was done which was a violation or an alleged violation when control was in effect but which is no violation today. I would like to give them the benefit of the doubt.

At the end of this bill I shall offer a very, very simple amendment. It says simply this:

> That notwithstanding the provisions of the OPA act, the administration shall not institute and he shall not maintain nor shall any agency of government—

And that means the Department of Justice—> institute or maintain any action that arose out of the sale of a commodity with the exception of sugar, rice, and a rent receipt.

So we make those exceptions because they are considered for continued control. Some of them may be continued as in the case of sugar.

But with respect to these other commodities, why not give the humble citizenry, the little lady who sells a hat for 39 cents over the ceiling, who is in the toils of the law today, and the grocer who sold a can of baked beans for 5 cents more than the list price and who is in difficulty because somebody filed a treble damage action—as I say, why not give them a chance? Let us do something about it. I hope this amendment is in order.

I have not asked the Parliamentarian of the House about it. The chairman of the committee has been very gracious about it. We have discussed it. It was not presented to the committee for the reason that I have been so busy myself with appropriations work and with the budget committee work that I frankly did not have the time. But I wish you would think about it because here is an opportunity to do something for people who are still within the shadow of the law as the result of an alleged violation for something which today is not a violation.

May I add that Mr. Remy, enforcement officer for OPA, has an adequate appreciation of this problem and has been genuinely cooperative in finding an administrative solution. I esteem it a matter of high importance which merits immediate action.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I take this time to keep faith with those engaged in agriculture. Perhaps I shall want to ask the chairman of the committee one or two questions. There has been handed to me language which applies to lines 23 and 24 on page 7 of the bill. On line 23, after the word "cases", the language has been suggested to be added, "with particular regard to the needs of farm households and the prevention of wastage of milk, fruits, and perishable agricultural commodities."

I should like to ask the chairman if in addition to what the chairman has already given us along that line, he feels it is necessary for us to further strengthen the language in subparagraph (b) with respect to those particular items, or does the chairman and the committee feel that that matter is quite substantially taken care of under the language of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. We had the alternative between allocating these percentages or writing the lines which we did in the bill, with the explanatory matter in the report. I might say to the gentleman, and perhaps to refresh the memories of those in the House on this point, that when courts interpret the language of a statute, especially where the court is trying to determine legislative intent, the courts look first to the language of the act itself. Then if there are ambiguities in the act, the committee report is taken next in importance to the bill in determining legislative intent. We decided we might run into so many difficulties in administering this law if we tried to provide percentage-wise allocations that it would be better to handle the matter by language in the report which would make it very clear as to what our intent was in that particular. We did that, and I believe that the language of the bill with explanatory matter in the report which for purposes of determining legislative intent are next in effectiveness to the bill itself, that the matter to which the gentleman refers will be adequately taken care of; and if it is possible to allocate it, the reasonable demands of every householder for canning purposes should be taken care of. It is our intent that they shall be taken care of if it is reasonably possible to do so.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I thank the chairman for that explanation.

There is one other suggestion in the same paragraph: Following the word "history" in line 24, add this sentence:

In making allocations the Secretary shall give first consideration to medicinal, medical, food and other essential users.

I assume the remarks which the chairman has just made would apply also to that, the committee relying upon the good faith and integrity of the Secretary of Agriculture to use judgment and discretion and to follow the committee's intent as nearly as possible.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. Prior to the expiration of the authority granted by this act, the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized and directed to remove any or all controls with respect to any product over which control is authorized by this act when he determines that the supplies of sugar are sufficient to warrant such action.

SEC. 3. (a) The powers, functions, and duties of (1) the President under title III of the Second War Powers Act, 1942, and the amendment to existing law made thereby: (2) the President or any executive department under section 6 of the act of July 2, 1940; (3) the Price Administrator under the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942; and (4) the President and the Price Administrator under the Stabilization Act of 1942, all as amended and extended (and irrespective of what officer, department, or agency may be now exercising any such power, function, or duty) are, insofar as they relate to sugar, hereby transferred to and shall be executed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

(b) Every order, directive, rule or regulation relating to any power, function, or duty transferred by subsection (a) of this section, issued by any officer, department, or agency heretofore performing such power, function, or duty, which is not in conflict with the provisions of this act and which is in effect on the date of the enactment of this act, shall continue in full force and effect, according to its terms, unless and until modified or rescinded by the Secretary of Agriculture.

(c) So much of the unexpended balances of appropriations, allocations, or other funds, and the property available for the use of any officer, department, or agency in the exercise of any power, function, or duty transferred by subsection (a) of this section or for the use of the Secretary of Agriculture in the exercise of any power, function, or duty so transferred, as the Director of the Bureau of the Budget shall determine, shall be transferred for use in connection with the exercise of such powers, functions, or duties. In determining the amount to be transferred, the Director of the Bureau of the Budget may include an amount to provide for the liquidation of obligations incurred against such balances of appropriations, allocations, or other funds prior to the transfer. Such personnel as the Director of the Bureau of the Budget determines to be required may also be transferred temporarily to the Department of Agriculture pending termination in whole or in part of the powers, functions, and duties transferred by subsection (a) of this section. There are authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of Agriculture such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

Mr. REES. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. REES: On page 9, line 23, after the period following the word "act", insert "provided, nothing in this section shall in anywise be construed to violate any of the veterans' preference act of 1944."

Mr. REES. Mr. Chairman, I shall not take much time of the committee except to say that this is the amendment I discussed earlier in the afternoon.

I trust the chairman of the committee will accept the amendment.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REES. I yield.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I have not of course canvassed the committee, but so far as I personally am concerned I can see no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. (a) It shall be unlawful for any person to do or omit to do any act, in violation of any order, directive, rule, or regulation continued in effect by section 3 (b) of this act or issued in the exercise of any power, function, or duty transferred by section 3 (a) of this act.

(b) It shall be unlawful for any officer or employee of the Government, or for any adviser or consultant to the Secretary of Agriculture in his official capacity, to disclose, otherwise than in the course of official duty, any information obtained under this act, or to use any such information, for personal benefit.

(c) Any person who willfully violates any provision of this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be subject to a fine of not more than $5,000, or to imprisonment for not more than 2 years in the case of a violation of subsection (b) and for not more than 1 year in all other cases, or to both such fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 5. As used in this act—

(a) The term "person" includes an individual, corporation, partnership, association, or any other organized group of persons, or legal successor or representative of any of the foregoing, and includes the United States or any agency thereof, or any other government, or any of its political subdivisions, or any agency of any of the foregoing: Provided, That no punishment provided by this act shall apply to the United States, or to any such government, political subdivision, or agency.

(b) The term "sugar" means any grade or type of saccharine product derived from sugarcane, sugar beets, or corn, including liquid sugar, sirups, molasses, or mixtures thereof, and sugar-containing products, which contain sucrose, dextrose, or levulose.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DIRKSEN: After line 7, on page 11, add a new section reading as follows:

"SEC. 6. A new section is added to the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, as amended, to read as follows:

"'Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in this act, no action shall be instituted or maintained under section 205 (a) or 205 (e) by the Administrator, or on behalf of the United States by any other officer or agency of the Government, if the violation arose out of the sale of a commodity other than sugar or rice or the payment or receipt of rent for defense area housing accommodations.'"

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not germane to the bill under consideration.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the gentleman would withhold the point of order for a moment.

Mr. MONRONEY. I will be delighted to reserve the point of order.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, indulge me just a moment to say that this proposal to decontrol actions at law and to give our people a little break and to take them out from under the shadow of law is not quite so startling as it sounds. I have spoken some with the enforcement officials of OPA, and they have been endeavoring to set up some kind of a cut-off, measured in terms of dollars below which they would automatically throw these actions out of court. Whether it should be $2,000, $3,000, $9,000, or $10,000, is a matter in question. They did submit to me a figure to the effect that at $3,000 probably 60 percent of these actions would go into the discard. So, you see, the enforcement officials of OPA have been giving this matter some consideration. I think it would be an astonishing thing indeed, however, if, with respect to decontrolled commodities, all these actions at law were some day transferred to the Department of Justice, and that out of violations that arose from the sale of commodities, other than sugar, rent, or rice, that people will still be relentlessly pursued by the Government when they have come under a violation. The matter is worthy of real consideration by the House, because this shadow is upon these people until either administrative or legislative action has been taken.

Mr. Chairman, with respect to the point of order it did occur to me that because of the general policy set out in the bill, and in view of the fact that it relates to the whole OPA act, the Stabilization Act and the Second War Powers Act, that it might be germane to the bill, notwithstanding the fact that it deals broadly with OPA, whereas the bill in question relates only to one commodity.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Would the gentleman's amendment in relation to audits of possible overpayment of subsidies entirely substitute the provisions of the price-control procedure?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I doubt it very much.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. HARRIS. I wonder if the gentleman will not agree with me that it might be better if these matters could be worked out administratively, in view of the subsidy just mentioned by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE]? If the enforcing officials of OPA could work this matter out separately and as an administrative policy, it would be better than approaching it by legislation here. I have prepared a bill that proposes to do the same thing. I understand that there was $123,000,000 in subsidies involved. I wonder if the gentleman would not agree that it could be worked out much better administratively?

Mr. DIRKSEN. My answer is: It is equally effective whether it is worked out administratively or legislatively, but the essential thing is that nearly 6 months have gone by since these commodities have been decontrolled, and these people still have an action at law hanging over them in the Federal courts of the country.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. Chairman, since this bill deals exclusively with sugar, and since the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois specifically exempts sugar from any consideration in the amendment, I renew my point of order against the gentleman's amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The gentleman from Illinois has offered an amendment to which the gentleman from Oklahoma has raised a point of order upon the ground that it is not germane. As indicated by the gentleman from Oklahoma, the resolution before the Committee, both in its title and in the provisions contained in the body of the bill, relates solely and exclusively to the commodity of sugar.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois seeks to amend the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942 by adding a new section. The effect of that amendment is to cover commodities of all sorts, types, and descriptions, remedies, penalties, and procedures covered by the Price Control Act of 1942, with the exception of sugar; therefore, in the opinion of the Chair, it is not germane to the resolution before the Committee of the Whole, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

The question is on the committee amendment as amended.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the preamble to the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the war has resulted in an acute shortage of sugar to an extent which is impairing the reconversion of the national economy from war to peace; and

Whereas it is in the interest of national defense and security to effectuate an orderly distribution of sugar at reasonable prices in order to prevent profiteering, hoarding, market manipulation, and speculation in sugar; waste or spoilage of perishable agricultural commodities; and to prevent or eliminate other disruptive practices arising out of the scarcity of sugar: Therefore be it

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all of the preamble.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COLE of New York, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee having had under consideration the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 146) to extend the powers and authorities under certain statutes with respect to the distribution and pricing of sugar, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 149, he reported the resolution back to the House with sundry amendments adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment to strike out the preamble.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 287, nays 54, not voting 91, as follows:

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have five legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on House Joint Resolution 146.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

PRINCETON UNIVERSITY BICENTENNIAL COMMISSION

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to the provisions of Public Law 367, Seventy-ninth Congress, the Chair appoints as commissioners of the United States Princeton University Bicentennial Commission the following Members on the part of the House to serve with himself: Mr. ANDREWS of New York, Mr. GAMBLE, Mr. MATHEWS, and Mr. FEIGHAN.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. JOHNSON of California (at the request of Mr. HALLECK) was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an address delivered by him at a convention of the American Legion at Indianapolis, Ind., on March 20.

Mr. CORBETT and Mr. SOMERS asked and were given permission to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BUSBEY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances; to include in one an address delivered by the Speaker over the American Broadcasting System on March 15 in behalf of the American Red Cross, and in the other an article appearing in the New Leader of March 15, 1947.

Mr. BONNER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND] secured permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include therein an article entitled "Marine Operating Problems of the Panama Canal and the Solution Thereto." He has been notified by the Public Printer that this will exceed two pages of the RECORD and will cost $266.25. Notwithstanding that fact, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent on behalf of the gentleman from Virginia that the article be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, notwithstanding the cost, the extension may be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial appearing in today's issue of the Washington Daily News.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order on Calendar Wednesday of next week be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

DELETION FROM RECORD

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the statement I made on March 17 on page 2219 of the daily RECORD.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I object, Mr. Speaker.

REFERENCE OF BILL

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, after conferring with the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs as well as the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I ask unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 1000 assigned to the Committee on Foreign Affairs be transferred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. KELLEY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a petition from the offices of the Independent Political Slovak Club of Monessen, Pa.

PALESTINE

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, for a long time the American Government has been committed to the establishment of a Jewish homeland in Palestine. For a long time the British Government has been committed to the establishment of a Jewish homeland in Palestine. Following the recent war, the British, without consulting us, stopped the immigration of Jews into Palestine. After tremendous protest, the British Government jointly, with our Government, established an Anglo-American Commission which studied this problem, and after months of deliberation and investigation, recommended the admission of 100,000 Jews to Palestine. The British Government promptly reneged on the official Anglo-American Commission's recommendations for the admission of 100,000 Jews to Palestine.

Mr. Speaker, our good President, Mr. Truman, has been insistent, has several times called to the attention of the British Government the fact that this Government and the American people believe that in all justice and in line with the commitments made by the British Government and the American Government, that 100,000 Jews should be admitted to Palestine. This the British have persistently refused to permit, and day by day are driving refugees from Hitler Germany at the point of the bayonet into new concentration camps on the island of Cyprus. I sum up and refresh our memory on these facts because they have a most important bearing on our good President's request for $400,000,000.

I wish to suggest that the British Government's word, and further, that its judgment, cannot be depended upon.

They would have us believe that Greece is important to our security, but their actions prove that Greece is unimportant to their security.

Mr. Speaker, the important thing about the President's request for funds is this. We propose to enter the political and economic life of the Middle East in a decisive way. That means that we intend to have our say, probably to become the dominant power—international power—in Greece, Turkey, Syria, Lebanon, Palestine, Trans-Jordan, Egypt, Iraq, Iran, Yemen, Saudi Arabia, in short, in the whole Near East-Middle East area. It is impossible to propose that we should take hold of the situation in Greece and Turkey without entering, becoming responsible for, the political, economic situation in every single near- and middle-eastern country.

Mr. Speaker, the British say that they need us to help them. Why then do not the British give us an equal voice in the solution of the question of Palestine? If the British need us to maintain their position in the Middle East, if they need our $400,000,000, why would not the British admit 100,000 Jews to Palestine? And why does not our State Department demand as a price for our even considering the question of advancing $400,000,000 that the British at least live up to their official commitments now 30 years old? How in God's name can we trust the judgment of the British Government or the word of the British Government? How can we continue to pour out the money of American men and women when we witness now the daily violation of the word of honor of the British Government on Palestine. Mr. Speaker, I ask now, on the floor of the House, of our State Department, when will the British agree to the announced American policy for the admission of 100,000 homeless, hungry, Jewish refugees from Nazi oppression into their historic homeland?

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MAHON, for March 20, on account of illness.

To Mr. CHADWICK (at the request of Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR.), for today, on account of illness.

SPECIAL ORDER

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOGGS] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include in my remarks an editorial from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch dated March 16, 1947; an editorial from Life magazine of March 17, 1947, entitled "Our Foreign Policy Crisis"; and an editorial from the New Orleans Item dated March 19, 1947, entitled "America's Great Opportunity."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

CREATION OF A UNITED STATES OF EUROPE

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a resolution which, if adopted, will put the Congress of the United States on record as favoring the creation of a United States of Europe. It is a simple resolution consisting of one sentence: "That the Congress favors the creation of a United States of Europe within framework of UN." The resolution, in my opinion, is timely and vital. It comes at a time when people all over America are repeating President Truman's assertion of last week when he addressed us on Greece that "Nobody knows where this will lead us," and it comes at a time when all thoughtful Americans are asking "After this, what?"

I believe that the vast majority of the Members of this body are in accord with our President on the necessity of rescuing Greece and the Near East from the aggressive communism sponsored by Moscow. I believe that the American people thoroughly appreciate the vital necessity of supporting the President. Students of history have drawn the parallel between the President's remarks of last week and President Roosevelt's "quarantine the aggressor" speech of 1937. They have pointed out how President Roosevelt's prophetic words fell upon deaf ears and how the democratic world suffered the humiliation of Munich and was finally subjected to the blood bath of the Second World War because of a policy of stupid appeasement. Yes; Mr. Speaker, we all know that appeasement and isolationism will not work. They have been tried twice and both times humanity has been subjected to the catastrophe of international warfare.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN. What nations are to be in this United States of the World, and how are they to vote? What vote is to be given to each nation?

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. My resolution does not contemplate the details of the organization, which will be set up in Europe; and in addition, it is not the United States of the World, it is the United States of Europe.

Mr. HOFFMAN. It is going to be confined to the nations of Europe?

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Under what theory does the gentleman believe we can advise Europe what to do?

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. If the gentleman will allow me to proceed I shall go on with my statement.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I shall be glad to, and I will listen with a great deal of interest because I am wondering how we could impose our will on those other nations.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. I think the gentleman will be very much interested.

Just as appeasement made Hitler secure in his belief that the democracies were soft and complacent and would not fight, a similar policy will convince the leaders of the Kremlin that the democratic world can be conquered by diplomatic maneuvers and threats of force and war. Therefore, I believe that all thinking Americans will support our Chief Executive. But, as the New Orleans Item pointed out in a forceful and magnificently written editorial of several days ago, entitled "America's Great Opportunity," the policy of holding fast and firm and of going to the help of the democratic nations of Europe, is a good policy but not good enough:

> Our policy, such as it is, springs not from action but reaction. Since the end of the war we have waited for Russia to punch, and then (sometimes) we counterpunch. Our counterpunching, especially in the last year, has been effective, but in the long run it won't be effective enough.
> Having no sovereign European plan of its own, the United States has been forced on the defensive. Our policy really consists of merely opposing Russian expansion. That certainly is better than acquiescing, but it still is negative. It offers no permanent relief. Even as a temporary expedient it has not been too successful.

In short, Mr. Speaker, my resolution would seek to recognize the fundamental truth that we have no positive foreign policy in Europe. It would substitute affirmative action and would point the direction that Europe must follow if it is again to become the great force for morality, for Christianity, and for progress that it has historically enjoyed in the world. There is no alternative. Already this Nation has appropriated or made available approximately $31,000,000,000 in American money for the rehabilitation of Europe, and despite this fabulous sum of money, the problem of Europe becomes more acute and more pressing as each day passes. No wonder Americans are saying, "Where do we go from here?"

Suppose, Mr. Speaker, that the men who drafted our magnificent Constitution and who made possible this glorious Federal Union of ours had not succeeded, and suppose our 48 sovereign States were 48 sovereign nations, with separate currencies, different ways of doing business, unintegrated systems of transportation and communication, with all sorts of trade restrictions and barriers, with separate armies and taxing authorities. Do you think that for one moment we would have here today on this continent this mighty Nation? Do you think our States would have been spared constant warfare? Do you think that our Nation would have achieved the unbelievable prosperity and scientific advancement that we now have? Suppose it were necessary to pay taxes and effect an international currency exchange to ship iron ore from the Great Lakes to Pennsylvania, and to transport crude oil from Texas to New York, or to move cotton from Georgia to New England. The very notion is fantastic.

Yet, this is what we are trying to do in Europe. We are trying to reconstitute all sorts of artificial barriers. We are playing a game of power politics in an era where power politics are as outmoded as the feudal system.

Is the plan that my resolution contemplates impractical? Is it utopian? Is it new or novel? All of these assertions have been made. But first, let us talk about whether or not it is impractical or utopian.

What can be a better illustration than the little country of Switzerland. There is the United States of Europe in miniature. The Swiss differ religiously, racially, politically, socially, industrially, and linguistically, yet the 25 cantons are welded into a federation with a common economic, foreign, and military policy, and without loss of essential sovereignty or the sacrifice of culture or tradition.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. I am glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Is not Switzerland a shining example of isolationism?

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. I do not think so.

Mr. HOFFMAN. There it is right in the middle of things and it has never taken part in any war, but has just been tending its own business.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Switzerland has achieved a magnificent advance in Europe because of its unification.

Mr. HOFFMAN. It is a little oasis of peace and prosperity, is it not?

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. That is correct.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Because it minds its own business and it does not interfere in any way with any of its neighbors.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. I think history will prove, Mr. HOFFMAN, that there are many factors other than what you call appeasement which have contributed to that situation.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. BROOKS. I have been listening with intense interest to the gentleman. The gentleman has mentioned the program for a United States of Europe which will relieve Europe of the situation in which it finds itself as a result of politics being played on the basis of the balance of power, which in my opinion has been the scourge of civilization for many a year.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. I appreciate the contribution of the gentleman.

Four different tongues—French, German, Italian, and Romansh—are recognized as national languages. Frieburg, a Catholic canton, lives happily side by side with Berne, solidly Protestant, and synagogues are found in every canton. Every so-called canton is a real state, with its own government and parliament, its own laws and taxes, its own traditions and symbols, and its own local patriotism. The Swiss Federation, however, governs foreign affairs, monetary affairs, foreign trade and duties, and ensures the civil rights of the individual and the cantons.

And for a few other illustrations, think of all that has already gone before in Europe. Think of Italy, and the long years when Sardinia, Savoy, Sicily, Piedmont, Lombardy, Venice, Rome, Naples, and Trieste fought bloody, cruel wars; yet so-called utopianism brought about unity; and have you forgotten the centuries during which the German principalities and other sovereign units fought one another in a ceaseless struggle for power?

So, the argument that the plan is utopian or impractical falls by the wayside.

Is the plan novel?

On the contrary. It has been brought forward by the great thinkers of Europe for many centuries, and it has been advocated by intelligent Americans since the time of George Washington. It was George Washington who wrote the following prediction to General Lafayette:

We have sowed seeds of liberty and union that will spring up everywhere on earth, and one day, taking its pattern from the United States of America, there will be founded the United States of Europe.

Many leaders have worked to bring about the federation. After the First World War the movement received tremendous support from the great French leader and Premier, Briand. Before the rise of Hitlerism the Federation of Europe seemed almost certain of success. Twenty-six governments had approved the plan, and the union seemed to be in sight. Briand died, however, in 1932 and in 1933 Adolf Hitler proclaimed the Third Reich. Six years later the Hitler armies marched from country to country with a peculair plan of unification and federation under the banner of "master race" and similar Fascist philosophies.

Today the federation, however, has powerful voices raised in its behalf. Already that peerless British statesman and leader Winston Churchill has spoken out in powerful terms. He has been joined by General Smuts, the Prime Minister of South Africa, and on this side of the Atlantic by John Foster Dulles, and many other outstanding authorities on foreign policy.

Churchill, in an address at Zurich some months ago, had this to say:

It—

is the origin of most of the culture, art, philosophy, and science, both of ancient and modern times. If Europe were once united in the sharing of its common inheritance, there would be no limit to the happiness, the prosperity, the glory which its 300,000,000 or 400,000,000 people would enjoy. Yet it is from Europe that has sprung that series of frightful nationalistic morals, originated by the Teutonic nations in their rise to power, which we have seen in this twentieth century and which have for a long time wrecked the peace and marred the prospect of all mankind.

And what is the plight to which Europe has been reduced? Some of the small states have, indeed, made a good recovery, but over wide areas a vast, quivering mass of tormented, hungry, careworn, and bewildered human beings gaze on the ruins of their cities and scan the dark horizon for the approach of some new peril, tyranny, or terror.

They may still return. There is a remedy which, if it were generally and spontaneously adopted by the great majority of people in the many lands, would, as if by a miracle, transform the whole scene and would in a few years make all Europe, or the greater part of it, as free and as happy as Switzerland is today.

What is this sovereign remedy?

We must build a kind of United States of Europe.

If time permitted, I could quote at length from John Foster Dulles, and many others. Suffice it to say that a United States of Europe, I believe, is on its way. The great scholar Richard Coudenhove-Kalergi has polled the members of European parliaments and governments, and he has received 624 replies. Only 12 were against the plan. This summer in Geneva the first Congress of European members of parliament will meet. It will draft a European charter, and submit practical suggestions for the economic and political integration of Europe.

In the words of the Item editorial:

Perhaps in spite of all the good omens this dream won't come true, but it is worth all the trying we have in us. It can't be tried at all without our leading the way. At this point only America has the means and the power to launch the idea, to encourage and influence its growth, and sustain it to maturity.

It will be costly, but not as costly as our present policy. It will be discouraging, especially at first, but not as discouraging as what is happening now. And, if we should ultimately succeed we will have accomplished one of the great undertakings of mankind.

IN CLIO'S WOMB

"History," said Voltaire, "is the tread of wooden shoes going up the stairs, and the patter of satin slippers coming down." The patter of satin slippers on history's stairway now is the receding British Empire; the clatter of wooden shoes is the lumbering of Russian imperialism fired by the proselyting zeal of the Communist dogma.

The surging dynamic of communism cannot be met by tired, static and quiescent institutions which demonstrate daily in England, France, and Germany their inability to give the masses the standard of living which they have a right to expect of a modern industrial civilization. The Communist threat can be held at bay, but it cannot permanently be vanquished by such things as loans to Britain, Greece, and Turkey, an increase in the calorie content of German rations, or token forces, garrisoned like police squads, on Russia's boundaries.

Such measures as President Truman now is taking to call Russia's hand, backed up by the atom bomb and America's aptitude for industrial warfare, may restrain the ambitions of a Russia still staggering from blows received in the last war. But they are not a long-range answer to the dangers of an uneasy peace.

SEEDBED OF WAR

And indeed, if Russia and the United States went to war and Russia were resoundingly defeated, it would be no more an answer to the fundamental problem of European civilization than were the defeats of Germany in 1918 and 1945. Before the United States entered the last war, the Post-Dispatch said, in 1940:

"What are the historical forces whose ferment has brought Europe into a great war for a second time in a quarter-century? * * * This area is divided into many separate nations, each with its own illogical tariff barriers, which keep it from exporting its surplus commodities to its neighbors or receiving from them the goods in which it is deficient. * * * To carve a continent into a crazy quilt of small nations creates irresistible economic pressures. Recurrent explosions are inevitable until some machinery for relieving these pressures is devised."

There is more of a vacuum to fill than that of rotting empire. There is also the vacuum of frustrated economic institutions.

Communism's great ally in Europe today is not the cold, abstruse materialism of the Marxian doctrine; it is "balloon belly" in Germany and the Balkans, toothless children in France and Britain, and everywhere, from the crumbling cliffs of Dover to the Black Sea, scurvy and rickets and a door closed against a comfortable and decent human existence.

Yet the situation is not hopeless. A new age knocks on the door of time. The muse of history is in travail; a young giant stirs in Clio's womb, if only the midwives of European politics will stir themselves to attend its birth.

THE GREAT DESIGN

Amidst the ruins of falling empire, there is an instrument that could be used to fill the void. That is a United States of Europe. It is an instrument not limited to the negative object of fending off communism, but possessed of a dynamic and purpose which can interpose a true bulwark against the Communist thrust.

It is a plan the need for which has been recognized from the Middle Ages. In the early seventeenth century, it was the great design of Henry the Fourth of France and his minister, Sully, and might conceivably have been achieved then had not Henry fallen at the hand of the addled ex-valet, Ravaillac.

In the nineteenth century, another Frenchman, Victor Hugo, championed the idea. At the International Peace Congress at Paris in 1849, he said:

"A day will come when those two immense groups, the United States of America and the United States of Europe, shall be seen placed in the presence of each other, extending the hand of fellowship across the ocean, exchanging their produce, their commerce, their industry, their arts, their genius, clearing the earth, peopling the deserts, improving creation under the eye of the Creator and uniting, for the good of all, these two irresistible and infinite powers, the fraternity of men and the power of God."

In the late 1920's, as Europe teetered between two wars, yet another eloquent Frenchman, Aristide Briand, pressed for a federated Europe. With a mortal illness upon him—he was to be dead within the month—Gustav Stresemann, the German democratic leader, made a moving appeal for the Briand scheme in the League Assembly. But to the move for unity Britain opposed her old formula of "Divide and rule"; Briand's plan was stilettoed by the bumbling Baldwin, aided by France's Fascist Flandin. Now Europe's men of vision speak out again, trying to make themselves heard above the thunderous roar of torpor and inertia. Prime Minister Attlee has said, "Europe must federate or perish." Winston Churchill has said:

"If, in this interval, we can revive the life and unity of Europe and Christendom, and with this new reinforcement build high and commanding a world structure of peace which no one will dare challenge, the most awful crisis of history will have passed away and the highroad of history will again become open."

ESCAPE FROM FRAGMENTATION

The political advantages of European union have been well explored. Less has been said—much too little—about the economic, ethnic, and cultural advantages of federation. Therein lies tangible promise of a more prosperous life that can overcome lethargy and tradition and move men to clothe a dream with reality.

Shackled in their present narrow boundaries, and unsustained by the booty of imperialism which poured in so richly in the past, neither Britain nor the continental nations have much prospect of a high standard of living. But with their commerce revived by a free flow of commerce among them, with their talents pooled to utilize the fallow sections of the world, what a prospect of material rewards would unfold before them.

Across the oceans lie the black deltas of Africa, the rich plains and plateaus of New Guinea, the volcanic soil of New Britain and New Caledonia, the infinitely fertile muck of the New Hebrides and the Solomons, all waiting to yield up vast stores of food for a mechanized agriculture, an agriculture which would give a prized outlet to the industrial genius of the Germans and the commercial talents of the British.

The world's mineral wealth waits to yield its riches to the same pooled efforts of British, French, and German capital and enterprise. Above all, the magic of organic chemistry and of atomic science wait to pluck from earth and air bounties which can be reaped only by large-scale industry serving merged populations unhindered by trade barriers and cartels.

TESTS OF A HEALTHY NATION

A United States of Europe, confident in its own strength, and sharing common ideals with the United States of America, would be freed in substantial measure from the crushing load of military budgets and could devote more of its resources to the causes of peace.

Bruce Hopper, the Harvard historian, in an essay on the rise and fall of nations, lists these three essentials of a strong nation today:

1. Actual possession of sufficient raw materials for advancing industrialism.

2. Possession of a highly developed industrial technology to support modern war.

3. An adequate population, a high reproductive rate of the manpower, virility, and energy.

Alone, no European nation has more than one or two of these three essentials for a strong and viable state. United they would have all three in great abundance.

What should be the role of the United States in the creation of a like nation in Europe? First, the role is to guarantee the emerging federation from military interference by Russia. Second, to give financial assistance in generating economic strength. Third and perhaps foremost, to supply encouragement and vision for consummation of the project. It is President Truman's chance to bid for a place with the immortals.

TO LIFT EUROPE FROM DESPAIR

A thousand obstacles—political, racial, and ideological—to the creation of a United States of Europe spring instantly into the practical mind. But how precious are the prejudices and hatreds of Europe, compared to a plan that could lift the continent from a morass of despair?

World crises like the present one demand more than practicality. They require vision, imagination, and heroic boldness. No accomplishment could be more satisfying than to see this old and bloody continent, which has seen so much misery through the centuries, united, peaceful, and arrayed to achieve the full promise of its cultural past.

Let those who call themselves statesmen prick themselves awake with the sharp nettles of necessity and rise to the roles to which history calls them. Or if it is not in them to react with verve and vision, let them band together and act, as Kipling said, "from common funk." Like the famous advice Benjamin Franklin gave to the American colonies, for Europe it is a case of join—or die.

[From Life magazine of March 17, 1947]

OUR FOREIGN POLICY CRISIS—IT CALLS NOT FOR ACTIONS ALONE BUT FOR CLEARER AIMS AND MORE VIGOROUS IDEALS

Not since France collapsed in 1940 has United States foreign policy been under such strain as during the past fortnight. As Secretary of State Marshall went to Moscow on the momentous business of Europe's future, he left the United States Congress in a condition of bewilderment and shock caused by news of far greater moment, namely Britain's impending withdrawal from Greece.

The Americans have a phrase for it: Things are tough all over. Sharp-tongued Harry Gideonse, president of Freedom House and Brooklyn College, publicly hoped for Europe's and America's sakes that the Moscow Conference would fail. The experienced diplomat, Robert Murphy, left Berlin for the Conference in a mood which indicated he was sure it would fail. As for the decision on Greece which faces Congress, even Truman, whose sunny demeanor has struck a cheery note during this solemn fortnight, was gloomy and uncertain. Said he to the Congressmen, "Nobody knows where this will lead us."

No, of course nobody knows. But we can be sure of this: no Moscow conference, no Greek loan, no diplomatic step of any kind will lead us very far unless we can surmount such challenges with a clearer idea of what we think we are up to. Representative EATON, chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, spoke the general need when he asked the President to "enunciate a world policy" into which the Greek, German, and other parts of the puzzle could be fitted. At last week's end the President was working on it. But the issues in this crisis run very deep. Not only the President but every interested citizen should think where we are heading.

TEN MILLION CRIMES

In sending George Marshall to Moscow the United States has no reason to fear that its end of that negotiation will be bungled. He is clearly a man of enormous competence, who knows what he wants from this conference, what opposition he will probably meet and what prices he will pay to overcome it. At once literate and businesslike, Marshall in his recent Princeton speech quoted approvingly from Justice Holmes: "Man is born to act. To act is to affirm the worth of an end, and to affirm the worth of an end is to create an ideal." This sentiment, it will be noted, makes ideals a byproduct rather than the motive of action.

As a practical man Marshall must base his German policy on what has gone before: the Potsdam Declaration, in which the Big Three agreed to punish, disarm and control Germany, and the Byrnes speech at Stuttgart, which promised national unity and a measure of hope to the German people. The economic unity of Germany, which Potsdam and Byrnes both promised, is therefore high on our Moscow agenda. It is an essential step toward the amelioration of Germany's acute misery and the economic recovery of Europe. Since the Soviets want more reparations from German production, agreement on this will be less a question of principle than of price.

But another left-over from Potsdam is a question of principle. Potsdam permitted the Poles in clear violation of the Atlantic Charter (to say nothing of human decency) to uproot and expel some 10,000,000 Germans from what used to be eastern Germany and is still not legally part of Poland. Competent witnesses have called this expulsion "a crime against humanity for which history will exact a terrible retribution." Having abetted this crime in advance at Potsdam, the United States is not likely to undo it at Moscow. There we will be asked to approve the Oder-Neisse line as Poland's legal boundary, thus repudiating the Atlantic Charter in letter as well as in spirit. Marshall is reportedly prepared to agree to an imperfect boundary if it will help him drive a bargain on some other front. Will he thereby invite history's retribution? Or must all active diplomacy involve some abetting of crime?

In Greece, if we take over the British commitment adequately, we will be abetting a civil war. The Greek Government is a rachitic monarchy revived by Winston Churchill. It makes no secret of what it wants of the United States: not just money but arms and moral support for the suppression of rebels. These rebels are salients of the Soviet drive for a Slav-Communist Balkan federation. If we leave Greece to its own fate, its Government will be overthrown and it will become part of this Communist federation. A chain reaction might well be started, producing Communist triumphs or advances throughout the Mediterranean world.

SOMETHING MISSING

Indeed things are tough: in Korea, China, India, Turkey, Hungary, Austria, all over. Things add up to what the Washington Post calls "a crypto-war situation" between the United States and Russia, a war whose stakes and fronts are at once territory and the minds of men. To Britain, Greece was a vital link in the old Suez lifeline. To America it is vital for equally stark and imperial, though for strategically different, reasons. We must extend our influence and commitments there simply because political physics abhors vacuum. That alone is a sufficient reason for Congress to back Truman and Marshall with a subsidy for Greece.

It is not a very inspiring reason, however, and in this crisis there is something much nobler in Congress' puzzled reluctance than there is in the impatience of our professional diplomats. To the latter the case for our intervention in Greece, like the case for realistic bargaining in Moscow, is open and shut. The operation they call "stern containment" of Russia is its own excuse for action. But Congress senses—quite rightly—that something is missing from such a foreign policy. The name of this missing ingredient is idealism, the kind of idealism which precedes and warrants action instead of tagging after it. It has been missing from our foreign policy for some time.

Among Marshall's advisers in Moscow is one who has peculiarly concerned himself with the role of ideals in foreign affairs. He is the international lawyer, Republican and church leader, John Foster Dulles, well known to the readers of Life (March 18, June 3, June 10, 1946). In recent speeches he has called again and again for more intellectual and moral vigor in the world leadership which history has thrust on the United States. "Negation," said he (i. e., stern containment?), "is never a permanent substitute for creation, and no nation is so poor as a nation which can give only dollars." He wants peace treaties that are not just compromises but that will "bring into being new forces which are curative and creative." Above all he wants a restatement of United States policy which will be consistent with the best ideals of our past.

Two examples of traditional United States policy which have served the twin causes of clarity and practical idealism are the Monroe Doctrine and the open door; another is our belief in the juridical equality of states and in free speech, which caused great improvements in the United Nations Charter at San Francisco. In Europe, however, our actions and words have not always coincided. If they had, two wars might have been avoided; we must not be guilty of what Dulles calls "contributory negligence" again. A clear statement of our European policy is now long overdue.

DULLES ON EUROPE

To Dulles, as to more and more thinking people, our policy should be to help the nations of Europe federate, as our States federated in 1787; and he has proposed Europeanizing the production of the Rhine-Ruhr industrial area as a practical step to this end. Thus could the Big Four help Europe become "something better than the rickety fire hazard of the past." But "if the Soviet Union does not want to advance Continental unity as a whole," says Dulles, "then a worth-while start could still be made in western Europe. There 200 million people could, through increased unity, achieve increased prosperity, freedom and peace."

Greece, the cradle of Europe's 3,000-year-old civilization, is still part of Europe. If our goal for all Europe were as clear as Dulles', our intervention there now would fall sensibly into place as a holding operation. Accompanied by a clear statement of United States aims, a loan to Greece (or to any other country) would be worth something. Not so accompanied, the money will be of dubious value and the adventure will indeed lead us "nobody knows where."

Regional goals, such as Dulles outlines, are not incompatible with more universal ideals. They are simply nearer and likelier to be achieved. Nor do they confine or commit us to the "spheres of influence" arrangement which, by the deal Roosevelt and Churchill made at Casablanca, has prevented us from taking a direct hand in Greek affairs until now. George Marshall was right when he said, "We are now concerned with the peace of the entire world." But as Dulles says, "Peace lies not in compromising but in invigorating our historic policies." The time to invigorate them is now.

[From the New Orleans Item of March 19, 1947]

AMERICA'S GREAT OPPORTUNITY

Just a year ago Soviet Russia threatened to overwhelm Iran; and out of that crisis developed the Byrnes policy of patience and firmness. By and large, it has been a good policy; but not good enough.

Today in Greece we have Iran all over again. Mr. Byrnes is gone, but President Truman and Secretary Marshall are holding fast and firm. The President has met the challenge of Russia, and there is little doubt that America will now come to the aid of Greece. So far so good; but still not good enough.

The plain truth is that, in a positive sense, America does not have a foreign policy, at least where Russia and Europe are concerned. Our policy, such as it is, springs not from action, but reaction. Since the end of the war we have waited for Russia to punch, and then (sometimes) we counterpunch. Our counterpunching, especially in the last year, has been effective, but in the long run it won't be effective enough.

In the reorganization of Europe we have been at a constant disadvantage because Russia knows what it wants and we don't. By assimilation, by puppet governments, by Communist Party collaboration, and other means, Russia is apparently bent on domination of the European continent.

Having no sovereign European plan of its own, the United States has been forced on the defensive. Our policy really consists of merely opposing Russian expansion. That certainly is better than acquiescing, but it still is negative. It offers no permanent relief. Even as a temporary expedient it has not been too successful.

When Russia calls the roll, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Rumania, Bulgaria, Bessarabia, Latvia, Estonia, and Lithuania answer. All have been lost to the ranks of democracy; and perhaps more are to follow. The struggle for Germany and Austria is now going on at Moscow. Italy and France are breathing under the oxygen tent of American dollars. Now Greece calls for artificial respiration. And we are driven to the humiliating expedient of backing Franco for fear Spain, too, will fall into the Soviet orbit.

The United States is failing in Europe; and it is failing because it hasn't a practical, long-range program for the continent. Just as after the First World War, we are trying to patch Europe together again without any regard for economic and political unity. Two World Wars and many smaller ones have shown that a disunited Europe, composed of numerous competing nations, can never hope for peace or prosperity.

What would a dis-United States be like? Suppose America consisted of the nation of Pennsylvania with all the coal, of Montana with the copper, Texas with the gas and oil, the Great Lakes region with the ore and industries? Suppose our great States and regions were nations, each with armies and tariff barriers? Can anyone doubt that war and poverty would soon be America's lot, as it is Europe's?

UNITY ONE WAY—OR ANOTHER

Yet that is the way we are trying to reconstruct Europe. It is utterly hopeless and it won't work. Europe must be unified; there is no permanent alternative. Eastern Europe already is being rapidly unified by Russia; and if western Europe is not soon united by a democratic federation it, too, may find unity through totalitarianism.

The United Nations is not the answer to this problem. A United States of Europe could become a great and wonderful new force within the UN, as the United States of America is, but there is little that the UN can now do to solve the economic and political anarchy of present-day Europe. The noble task of welding western Europe into a new democratic power can only be accomplished by the nations at interest, with the support and encouragement of the United States of America.

As the foreign secretaries debate the German peace treaty at Moscow, it is quite clear that the German problem cannot be solved until we have solved the problem of Europe. The world is divided over whether Germany shall be made strong or weak. All Europe would benefit economically from a strong and highly productive Reich, but a vigorous Germany might again become a military threat to its neighbors. That is the dilemma at the Moscow Conference. But if Germany became a part of a United States of Europe, there would be no such problem. With fear of aggression abandoned, all hands would set about restoring German industry as fast as possible.

NOT AN IDLE DREAM

A federated Europe may once have seemed an idle dream, but today it is idle to dream of any other solution. It goes without saying that to rescue Europe by federation will be difficult, but to save it without federation is impossible. The nations of western Europe have now reached the same crisis that once faced the 13 Original American States—they can hang together or hang separately.

There is nothing new or novel about this solution. George Washington once wrote to General Lafayette: "We have sowed seeds of liberty and union that will spring up everywhere on earth. One day, taking its pattern from the United States, there will be founded the United States of Europe." And this vision is even now shared by most of the democratic leaders of the world.

Winston Churchill, who is no utopian, is presently championing a united Europe with all of his energy. Recently General Smuts and John Foster Dulles spoke up for federation. President Truman is sympathetic to the idea and Prime Minister Attlee is the author of "Europe must federate or perish." Leon Blum and Edouard Herriot have long been advocates of federation; and it is no secret that de Gaulle leans in the same direction.

Count Coudenhove-Kalergi, the famous spokesman for European federation, is now polling 3,913 members of European parliaments on the establishment of a European federation within the framework of the UN. So far he has received 624 replies and only 12 were against the plan. Among the 86 members of the French assembly who answered "Yes" are Vincent Auriol, now president of the Republic; Vice Premier Henri Teitgen; War Minister Paul Coste-Floret; Maurice Schumann, founder of the M. R. P.; and Rene Capitant, leader of the de Gaullist Union.

THEY ANSWERED "YES"

Of the 107 members of the British Parliament who voted for federation, 64 belonged to the Labor Party and 34 to the Conservative group. One third of all members of Italy's national assembly voted for the plan, including cabinet members and party leaders. The Greek proponents number three party leaders and former prime ministers. Belgium, Luxemburg, and the Netherlands are already trying to create a customs-union in the heart of western Europe. Count Coudenhove-Kalergi believes that if a fair plebescite were held tomorrow on the issue of federation, men and women of all parties and nations would vote overwhelmingly for union.

Doubtless Russia would oppose such a solution. A divided Europe is a pushover for Russia; a united Europe would bring into being a great and self-sustaining new democratic power. The Russians would no doubt accuse us of organizing a new bulwark against communism. Thus there might be some friction at first. But how about the friction that exists now? If Europe remains helplessly divided, and Russia and America continue to battle month by month over one and then another European nation, we may have something worse than friction. A wise Russia would not oppose a united Europe, for what's good for Europe is finally good for Russia, too. After all, the Kremlin has a stake in peace, and the best hope for that is a stable, integrated Europe.

American dollar transfusions may save some of the European nations temporarily, but finally we will have to abandon Europe or help organize it into a healthy new unit capable of looking out for itself. There is not much time to lose, and the time for federation was never so ripe. Postwar Europe is still in a fluid state; its millions of citizens desperately need a new hope; the political climate is favorable; and, above all, the democratic world is looking to the United States of America for vision.

Perhaps in spite of all the good omens this dream won't come true, but it is worth all the trying we have in us. It can't be tried at all without our leading the way. At this point only America has the means and the power to launch the idea, to encourage and influence its growth, and sustain it to maturity.

SOMETHING TO STRIVE FOR

It will be costly, but not as costly as our present policy. It will be discouraging, especially at first, but not as discouraging as what is happening now. And if we should ultimately succeed we will have accomplished one of the great undertakings of mankind.

Whenever a government radically alters its foreign policy and embarks on an enterprise of great magnitude it needs the support of the people. It is unlikely that the present administration would adopt the objective of a United States of Europe without a mandate from the public. Therefore, we would like to see a resolution introduced in Congress which would commit the Government to this noble undertaking. We hazard the guess that such a resolution would receive tremendous support and kindle the hopes of all democratic peoples.

The resolution need not be long. As with the now historic Fulbright resolution, one sentence would be enough. For example, "Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Congress hereby expresses itself as favoring the creation of a United States of Europe, within the framework of the United Nations."

Just 100 years ago the great French writer, Victor Hugo, prophesied: "The day will come when these two huge unions, the United States of America and the United States of Europe, will face and greet each other across the Atlantic. When they will exchange their goods, their commerce, their industry, their art, and their genius to civilize the globe, to fertilize deserts, to improve creation under the eyes of the Creator. And to assure the greatest benefit for all by combining these infinite forces: the brotherhood of man and the might of God."

[From the New Orleans Item of March 20, 1947]

FEDERATED EUROPE PROPOSAL PRAISED

The Item's page 1 editorial yesterday advocating a democratic federation of nations in Europe—a "United States of Europe"—as the best possible means of maintaining the peace, met with favorable response in New Orleans.

Many letters and telephone calls came to the editor's desk expressing unsolicited agreement with the Item's program.

In addition the Item asked representative citizens of the State to express their opinion on the subject. A cross section of opinion is printed below:

Former Gov. Sam H. Jones: "Your editorial 'America's Great Opportunity,' is the most powerful argument for a 'United States of Europe' I have read. At the same time it gives a clear picture of our present inadequate foreign policy, particularly as respects Russia and Europe.

"The editorial's most potent quality, however, is the feeling one has when he finishes the reading—the feeling which says 'Why don't we do something about it?' "

Dr. Thornton Terhune, head of the department of history, College of arts and Sciences, Tulane University, and authority on European history: "I am in enthusiastic agreement with every word of the editorial entitled 'America's Great Opportunity.'

"An on-the-scene study of the suicidal course which European affairs, political, and economic, have been taking for the past 20 years has led me to have one positive conviction concerning the future of Western Europe.

"That conviction is simply this: It may still be possible to save western Europe, but nothing can save the individual western European nations as such.

"It seems to me, after careful study of the editorial, that both the essence and point of its message are to be found in one particular sentence, the one wherein you state: 'It goes without saying that to rescue by federation will be difficult, but to save it without federation is impossible.'

"You are absolutely right. And there will be many who will say: 'Yes, but can western Europe be saved even by federation?' This I would answer by telling a little story:

"I once knew an elderly and seasoned physician of the old-fashioned family-doctor type who was rather given to positive expression when irked by what seemed to him a lack of intelligence. One of his charges, a well-intentioned but none too brilliant creature, had the misfortune to suffer a ruptured appendix, whereupon the physician recommended an immediate operation.

" 'But, Doctor,' said the nervous patient, 'if they operate will you promise that I'll get well?'

" 'Hell, no,' he answered, 'but you're gonna die if they don't.'

"The analogy needs no amplification."

John Hall Jacobs, city librarian: "I extend my congratulations on your excellent statement of a plan which seems to be the best, in my opinion, that has been considered.

"It was a clear and helpful summary of the situation and as an editorial is in a class with the finest ones I have read.

"I agree wholeheartedly, with minor reservations, with this expression of our need for a program in relation to a permanent solution of the European situation."

The Reverend Thomas J. Shields, president of Loyola University: "The editorial 'America's Great Opportunity,' was very appropriate and very fine. After all, the human race is really one race, so why do we have to be so utterly separate and apart from each other, always fighting and quarreling?"

Archbishop Joseph Francis Rummell: "Undoubtedly the plan outlined in the Item editorial, on the formation of a United States of Europe, represents very progressive thinking and an idealism that is worthy of serious consideration.

"However, it is hardly fair to compare the merging of the Thirteen Colonies into the United States of America with the merging of the European nations into one united nation. In the first, there was uniformity of origin and language, for most of the colonists were of English origin.

"Also, there was a common ambition—namely, to be separated from the domination of the mother country and to breathe the air of freedom in a new atmosphere.

"In Europe there are centuries of tradition, with differences of nationality, language, custom and rivalries, all of which are still evident even in the midst of the modern crisis. Nevertheless, the ideal must some time be attempted, notwithstanding the evident difficulties.

"It is significant that 150 years have elapsed since Washington expressed the idea of a United States of Europe on the American pattern and 100 years have passed since Victor Hugo gave expression to the same idea; and yet, there has not been even an approach to such a unification.

"However, we must not despair. Certainly a United States of Europe is worth a trial and may prove the alternative of quarreling, rivalries and possibly new wars with which we are confronted, notwithstanding all the sacrifice and punishment of the recent World Wars.

"Let us hope that idealism will prevail once again, as it did in the formation of the United States of America."

Walter Williams, radio commentator: "I think America's Great Opportunity was one of the finest editorials I have ever had the pleasure of reading.

"I am enthusiastic about the plan advocated, which looks to me like the most practical solution yet offered for the problems of Europe.

"Such a federation of European nations could well save American lives and dollars. I am wholeheartedly in favor of it."

Ben J. Williams, cotton exporter: "In my opinion your editorial was outstandingly forceful, logical, and timely.

"You have pointed out the only course to be followed if world chaos is to be avoided and an enduring peace secured.

"I hope your contribution to the cause of sound thought, offered now while there is less freedom from fear and from want than ever, will receive world-wide attention.

"I suggest it be sent with the editor's personal letter of transmittal to a large number of important individuals in circles where our destiny is up for decision."

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.), under its previous order, the House adjourned until Monday, March 24, 1947, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE

MONDAY, MARCH 24, 1947

The Chaplain, Rev. Peter Marshall, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Lord God of hosts, Thou who art concerned about two billions of Thy creatures all over the earth, and yet who art as concerned about each of us here as if we were an only child, Thou dost understand how hard it is for these Thy servants to keep in mind the millions of their fellow citizens for whom they must legislate. Thou knowest the clamor of voices in their ears, the constant tugging at their sleeves, forever trying to influence them; the small voices of the little men without money or names; the blatant voices of aggressive pressure groups; the big voices of selfish men and those working for personal gain, even the whispering inner voices of personal ambition, those insinuating voices holding out the lure of unmerited reward. Amid all the din of voices, give these Thy servants the willingness to take time to listen to Thy voice, knowing that if they follow the still small voice within, all Thy people will be served fairly, and all groups will get what they deserve. For Jesus' sake. Amen.

DESIGNATION OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The Chief Clerk read the following letter:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D. C., March 24, 1947.

To the Senate:

Being temporarily absent from the Senate, I appoint Hon. WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND, a Senator from the State of California, to perform the duties of the Chair during my absence.

A. H. VANDENBERG,
President pro tempore.

Mr. KNOWLAND thereupon took the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. WHITE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Friday, March 21, 1947, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Maurer, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed the following joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. J. Res. 146. Joint resolution to extend the powers and authorities under certain statutes with respect to the distribution and pricing of sugar, and for other purposes; and

H. J. Res. 154. Joint resolution making an appropriation for expenses incident to the control and eradication of foot-and-mouth disease and rinderpest.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled joint resolution (H. J. Res. 27) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to the terms of office of the President, and it was signed by the Acting President pro tempore.

MEETING OF COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, indicating the reason for the letter which was read a moment ago from the desk, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Foreign Relations be permitted to continue to sit this afternoon in its hearings in respect to the Greek-Turkish loan.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

FINAL REPORT OF AMERICAN RED CROSS RELATING TO FOREIGN WAR RELIEF OPERATIONS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following communication from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, March 21, 1947.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE PRO TEMPORE.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith the final report prepared by the American Red Cross reflecting all foreign war relief operations which have been conducted since July 1, 1940, from appropriations for foreign war relief.

The Congress originally made available $85,000,000 for assistance to war-stricken persons throughout the world. Subsequent legislation consolidated and extended the availability of all funds until June 30, 1945. The Second Deficiency Appropriation Act, 1945, continued $2,150,000 available until December 31, 1945, in order to provide for the termination of the program.

There is also transmitted herewith a statement of allocations made to Government purchasing agencies from this appropriation together with balances remaining unobligated in each allocation.

Respectfully yours,

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following letters, which were referred as indicated:

SUPPLEMENTAL ESTIMATE, FEDERAL SECURITY AGENCY (S. DOC. NO. 20)

A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, a supplemental estimate of appropriation involving an increase of $100,000 for the Federal Security Agency, fiscal year 1948, in the form of an amendment to the budget for that fiscal year; to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

INTERNATIONAL INTERCHANGE AND INFORMATION ACT OF 1947

A letter from the Acting Secretary of State, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to enable the Government of the United States more effectively to carry on its foreign relations by means of (a) promotion of the interchange of persons, knowledge and skills between the people of the United States and other countries, and (b) public dissemination abroad of information about the United States, its people, and its policies (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

ACCRUED ANNUAL LEAVE DUE GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES UPON SEPARATION FROM SERVICE

A letter from the President of the United States Civil Service Commission, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the payment to certain Government employees for accumulated or accrued annual leave due upon their separation from Government service," approved November 21, 1944 (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Civil Service.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, or presented, and referred as indicated:

By the ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore:

A resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York; to the Committee on Armed Services:

"Senate Resolution 68

"Whereas the county of Queens, in the city and State of New York, has a population of 1,369,000 of whom 207,033 are veterans of World Wars I or II, or of the Spanish-American War, and the adjoining counties of Nassau and Suffolk have a combined veteran population in excess of 140,000; and

"Whereas most of these veterans requiring medical treatment or having claims for adjudication must travel great distances to the Veterans' Administration facility in the Bronx or regional office in Manhattan, and such travel causes severe hardship, particularly to those disabled; and

"Whereas the naval hospital at St. Albans, Queens County, N. Y., has a plant which fits it admirably for use as a combined facility of the Veterans' Administration providing adjudication service, out-patient service, examinations, rehabilitation service, and an orthopedic section; and

"Whereas the St. Albans Naval Hospital, with the Long Island railroad and various bus lines providing service at its door, offers convenient travel facilities to residents of Queens, Nassau, and Suffolk Counties; and

"Whereas some of the wards at the St. Albans Naval Hospital are now being used by the Veterans' Administration on a temporary basis and others have been closed or are being used for storage purposes; and

"Whereas those facts make it evident that the Veterans' Administration can, with little expense, no delay, and no inconvenience to the Navy, establish a combined facility at St. Albans, N. Y., providing convenient and adequate treatment and service for the large veteran population of the three counties named; and

"Whereas the shortage of space for rent and the obstacles to new construction generally prevailing make it improbable that such a combined facility can be opened elsewhere in any of the three counties named, within 3 years or more: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved (if the assembly concur), That the Congress of the United States be, and it hereby is, respectfully memorialized to take appropriate action to authorize the United States Veterans' Administration to take on the St. Albans Naval Hospital to provide adjudication service, out-patient service, examinations, rehabilitation service, and as an orthopedic section; and be it further

"Resolved (if the assembly concur), That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Senate, and the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States, the Administrator of the United States Veterans' Administration, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and to each Member of Congress elected from the State of New York."

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin; to the Committee on Armed Services:

"Senate Joint Resolution 26

"Joint resolution pledging the full cooperation of the State of Wisconsin, its agencies, and people, to the War Department, in the development of Camp McCoy as a permanent military camp

"Whereas it has been recently announced that Camp McCoy has been designated as a permanent military post contemplating a full utilization of the 61,000-acre reservation and the erection of many new permanent buildings, and

"Whereas the Army has made recommendations that regional improvements be provided for highways, railroads, telephone communication, supply routes, feeder routes, and expanded school, airport and recreational facilities, and

"Whereas the Army must depend upon the State and the nearby communities to assist in the provision of many of these improvements and to coordinate their activities with the planning of Camp McCoy in order to assure the greatest possible benefits to the Army, the State and the nearby communities in becoming a vital and integral part of this region, and

"Whereas it is highly necessary that such camp and its operation be continued in the State of Wisconsin so as to afford a good training area and good living conditions tending to a high morale for the personnel, and suitable public utilities, highways and communication systems for military training at a reasonable cost, and

"Whereas this vast training camp has a varied and interesting terrain suitable for all types of combat for both summer and winter conditions, modern barracks for housing more than 60,000 troops, an abundant supply of water, an extensive water and sewerage system, all types of necessary buildings, and other equipment, that will afford all required military facilities necessary to maintain an essential program of military training for the defense of this country, and

"Whereas the State, its agencies, the adjacent communities and the people of the State of Wisconsin pledge their cooperation and support to this plan of expansion that anticipates the provision of many of the requirements of schools, airport and recreational facilities that will assure a mutual continuation of Federal, State, and local benefits; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate (the assembly concurring), That the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin hereby pledges the cooperation of the State and all of its agencies, its friendly adjacent communities, and the people of the State, to a plan of expansion envisioning improved and enlarged public utilities, highways and school, airport and recreational facilities to assure the greatest possible benefits to everyone in the establishment of Camp McCoy as a permanent military post. Be it further

"Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the Secretary of War, to the commanding general of the Fifth Army Headquarters, Camp McCoy camp commander, to both Houses of Congress and to each Wisconsin member thereof."

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of New Mexico; to the Committee on Finance:

"House Joint Memorial 5

"House joint memorial memorializing and requesting the Congress of the United States to make national service life insurance available to all Pacific island veterans

"Whereas in some instances entire records pertaining to some Pacific island veterans have been lost, at least so far as records of their insurance are concerned, and these veterans are unable to prove that they carried such insurance or desired to carry such insurance, and are actually prevented from complying with the rules and regulations pertaining to national service life insurance through no fault of their own: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Legislature of the State of New Mexico:

"SECTION 1. That the Eightieth Congress of the United States of America, now in regular session assembled in Washington, D. C., be hereby memorialized and requested to enact legislation which will make national service life insurance available to all Pacific island veterans, particularly former prisoners of war in the Philippines, whether they have been carrying such coverage or not, and regardless of their present physical condition.

"SEC. 2. That copies of this resolution be forthwith sent respectively to the President of the United States of America, to the President of the United States Senate, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States of America, and to the Senators and Representatives of New Mexico in Congress.

"Approved by me this 12th day of March 1947.

"THOMAS J. MABRY,
"Governor, State of New Mexico."

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Montana; to the Committee on Appropriations:

"Senate Joint Memorial 14

"Joint memorial to the Congress of the United States and to the Administrator, Rural Electrification Administration, requesting action to provide funds for and to expedite the rural electrification program

"Whereas rural electrification is one of the major construction programs that add materially to the progress and development of our community, State, and Nation; and

"Whereas the public need and demand for electricity for rural American and small towns without central electric service is imperatively essential for our modern progress and development; and

"Whereas the urgent need for electricity has not been completely solved and which circumstances has resulted in denying thousands of American farmers and small towns of electric energy; and

"Whereas, that in cooperation with our Government and which is in a favorable position to best finance rural electrification projects to serve the largest number of consumers; and

"Whereas the Rural Electrification Administration should be fully authorized and directed to make adequate allocations to the various so-called REA projects, to thereby enable such REA projects to fully complete their pending demands for electric lines, office buildings, maintenance equipment, and/or any other equipment or material necessary for the practical construction and operation of electric lines; and

"Whereas to best serve all the people on an area coverage basis, the allocations should be made in full and not subdivided so as to further delay or deny the people of any area or community electric energy service; and

"Whereas it is necessary to avoid any further delay of construction, requests for allocating of funds to REA projects should be authorized and promptly granted by the Rural Electrification Administration upon the application for a loan of any REA project that furnishes a gross estimate and preliminary map or maps showing the estimated mileage and cost of construction prepared by the respective REA projects engineer or engineers; and

"Whereas the REA construction program can be greatly speeded up and construction costs reduced by reducing to a minimum the various technicalities and duplications: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate of the State of Montana (the house of representatives concurring), That we do hereby respectfully petition the Congress of the United States for the passage of necessary legislation providing for adequate funds and authorization and direction for expedient execution of the REA program; and be it further

"Resolved, That we do hereby respectfully petition the Administrator of the Rural Electrification Administration to make early and full allocations to applicants for loans by REA projects and further, that in order to expedite the construction program and to reduce to a minimum all technical and duplicating regulations; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this memorial be transmitted by the secretary of state of the State of Montana to the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States, to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Montana and to the Administrator of the Rural Electrification Administration.

"Approved March 4, 1947.

"SAM C. FORD,
"Governor."

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Montana; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

"Senate Joint Memorial 15

"Joint memorial to the Congress of the United States requesting legislation to reimburse wheat growers who sold their 1945 wheat early and were deprived of benefit of advance in price

"To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress Assembled:

"Whereas thousands of American farmers enjoying full confidence and respect for our American public officials did sell in the year of 1945 and the forepart of 1946, wheat at set Government prices based upon the Government assurances that no further advance prices would be made on the said 1945 wheat crop, and

"Whereas during the latter part of 1945 and early part of 1946 prices were advanced 48 cents per bushel on wheat, and that therefore the thousands of farmers with full confidence in their Government officials sold their grain early and were deprived of the discriminating 48 cents per bushel advance: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate of the State of Montana (the House of Representatives concurring), That we do hereby respectfully petition the honorable Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States Congress to enact legislation providing funds to reimburse the wheat growers who sold their 1945 wheat early and were deprived of the benefit of the advance in the price of wheat; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this memorial be transmitted by the secretary of state of the State of Montana to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Montana.

"Approved March 4, 1947.

"SAM C. FORD,
"Governor."

A memorial of the Senate of the State of Montana; to the Committee on Appropriations:

"Senate Memorial 1

"Memorial to the Congress of the United States requesting the Congress to make funds available for the immediate construction of an electrical transmission line from Kerr Dam to Hungry Horse and to appropriate funds for the prompt construction of Hungry Horse Dam in northwestern Montana

"To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress Assembled:

"Whereas the United States Bureau of Reclamation has completed the survey and plans for the construction of Hungry Horse Dam in northwestern Montana and said Bureau has already commenced preconstruction work in the preparation of a camp and the building of access roads and other activities; and

"Whereas the construction of an electrical transmission line from Kerr Dam to Hungry Horse site is required as a preliminary to construction work on Hungry Horse Dam itself, and will be used in transmitting power from said Hungry Horse Dam when the dam is completed; and

"Whereas the construction of said dam will be a means of securing cheap electricity for industrial and home and farm use in western Montana; and

"Whereas the cheapness of power will attract new industries to western Montana and thereby benefit the entire State and the Northwest part of the United States; and

"Whereas this postwar period is the most desirable time to encourage and promote new industries and reclamation of additional lands; and

"Whereas the construction of the said dam will provide water storage for water sufficient for the reclamation and irrigation of thousands of acres of land in western Montana; and

"Whereas the construction of said dam will be the means of providing flood control along the Columbia River and restoration of several thousand acres along the Flathead River; and

"Whereas many other benefits will result from the construction and operation of said dam which will be beneficial to the State of Montana and to the United States in their general reclamation and flood-control programs and in the encouragement of new industrial development: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate of the State of Montana, That the Congress of the United States of America be respectfully urged and requested to make funds available for the immediate construction of an electrical transmission line from Kerr Dam to Hungry Horse and to appropriate sufficient funds for the prompt construction of Hungry Horse Dam in northwestern Montana; be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be submitted by the secretary of state of the State of Montana to the President of the United States; to the Presiding Officers of both Houses of the National Congress; to the chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the United States House of Representatives; to the Commissioner of Reclamation; and to each of the Senators and Representatives in the Congress from the State of Montana."

(The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a memorial of the House of Representatives of the State of Montana, identical with the foregoing, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.)

Two joint memorials of the Legislature of the State of Montana; to the Committee on Public Lands:

"Senate Joint Memorial 7

"Joint memorial to the President and Congress of the United States requesting the enactment of legislation authorizing the State of Montana to lease State lands for the production of oil, gas, and other hydrocarbons for such periods of time and on such terms and conditions as may be provided by the Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana

"To the President of the United States and to the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

"Whereas under act of Congress approved February 22, 1889, entitled "An act to provide for the division of Dakota into two States and to enable the people of North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, and Washington to form constitutions and State governments, and to be admitted into the Union on equal footing with the original States, and to make donations of public lands to such States," commonly known as the Enabling Act, as amended by an act of Congress approved May 7, 1932, the State of Montana is restrained from leasing State lands for oil and gas and other hydrocarbons for a longer term than 20 years; and

"Whereas such restriction has resulted in failure of the State lands to be developed for the production of oil, gas, and other hydrocarbons on an equal footing with public and privately owned lands similarly situated; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate of the State of Montana (the house of representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, petitioned to enact suitable legislation amending the said Enabling Act and authorizing the State of Montana to lease her State lands for the production of oil, gas, and other hydrocarbons for such periods of time and on such terms and conditions as may be, from time to time, provided by the Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana; be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this memorial be forwarded by the secretary of state of the State of Montana to the President of the United States, to the President pro tempore of the Senate of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, to the Honorable JAMES E. MURRAY and ZALES N. ECTON, Senators from Montana, and to the Honorable MIKE MANSFIELD and WESLEY A. D'EWART, Representatives in Congress from Montana.

"Approved March 3, 1947.

"SAM C. FORD,
"Governor."

"Senate Joint Memorial 8

"Joint memorial of the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Montana, to the Congress of the United States, United States Senators JAMES E. MURRAY and ZALES N. ECTON, and Representatives MIKE MANSFIELD and WESLEY A. D'EWART, all of Washington, D. C., requesting the enactment of legislation, allowing for and directing the annual payments of grants by the United States Government to the State of Montana for the use and benefit of the several counties of Montana in lieu of taxes on lands owned by the United States Government in the State of Montana

"Whereas in Montana there is an excess of 39 percent of our landed area which is owned by the Government of the United States, so held by it in proprietory or trustee capacity for Indian reservations, forest reserves, wild-life refuge, grazing lands, military reservations, and numerous other governmental purposes and objects, none of which lands pay taxes to the State of Montana or the counties therein, nor contribute equitable amounts in lieu of taxes to the school districts, counties and State government, all of which furnish services to such lands and their occupants; and

"Whereas such areas are increasing, and the taxation burdens upon sparsely settled communities of our State are becoming more serious; and

"Whereas these areas should bear some part of the tax burden comparable to that imposed on lands of our own taxpayers; and

"Whereas there has been and will be introduced in the Congress of the United States acts under which the Government of the United States will pay to the several States of the United States for the benefit of counties wherein Government held lands are located, grants in lieu of taxes upon these lands: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Thirtieth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana (senate and house of representatives concurring), That we respectfully urge the enactment of legislation by the Congress of the United States providing for the evaluation of property owned or held by the United States Government and providing for payments or grants to the State of Montana for the use and benefit of the counties wherein Government-held lands are located, in lieu of taxes upon these lands; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this memorial be submitted by the secretary of state of Montana to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States Congress and to Senators JAMES E. MURRAY and ZALES N. ECTON and Representatives MIKE MANSFIELD and WESLEY A. D'EWART.

"Approved March 3, 1947.

"SAM C. FORD,
Governor."

INCOME-TAX RETURNS IN COMMUNITY-PROPERTY AND NON-COMMUNITY-PROPERTY STATES

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference a petition which was sent me by a distinguished State senator and outstanding lawyer, Hon. Earl J. Lee, of Nebraska. The petition prays for the enactment of Senate bill 649 so that married persons who live in States where community-property laws do not exist and who file joint income-tax returns may be placed on a par with those who file joint returns in States where community-property laws do exist. The petition is signed by 43 persons, the total membership of the Nebraska State Legislature. I agree in toto with the principle of Senate bill 649; indeed, a similar bill was introduced by me in the Seventy-ninth Congress. I ask unanimous consent that the petition may be printed in the RECORD without the signatures attached.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, without the signatures attached, as follows:

To the Members of the Senate of the United States:

Whereas there is pending in the Senate of the United States Senate bill 649; and

Whereas Nebraska is a State without community-property laws; and

Whereas the enacting of Senate bill 649 into a law will place married persons living in Nebraska who file joint income-tax returns on the same par with those persons living in a State where community-property laws exist:

Now, therefore, we the undersigned members of the sixtieth session of the Legislature of Nebraska, 1947, petition the Senate of the United States:

To place married persons who live in States where community-property laws do not exist and who file joint income-tax returns on a par with those who file joint returns in States where community-property laws exist by enacting Senate bill 649 into a law.

LETTER FROM NATIONAL SMALL BUSINESS MEN'S ASSOCIATION

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, the National Small Business Men's Association has recently brought to the attention of Congress a number of interesting letters with respect to the condition of small business throughout the country. I think the letters, which are in the nature of reports, will be of unusual interest to the Members of the Senate, and I ask unanimous consent that one of the letters from Kansas be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL SMALL BUSINESS
MEN'S ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D. C., March 20, 1947.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: On February 6, Mr. DeWitt Emery, president of the National Small Business Men's Association wrote to the entire membership of the association requesting an expression of opinion on revising the Wagner Act and other labor laws. Upon receiving replies we compiled the attached statement giving views of 146 of our members, which was presented as an exhibit by Mr. Emery when he appeared before the House Committee on Education and Labor on March 15.

In analyzing this statement it is quite apparent that labor difficulties are not confined to any one section of the country. The difficulties encountered by businessmen in Maine, New York, and Florida are comparable to those in Washington and California. It will be noted that the preponderance of quotations advocated a revision of the Wagner Act so as to put full and equal responsibility on all parties involved, and abolishment of the closed shop and all compulsory unionization.

The small businessmen of America are looking to the Eightieth Congress for legislation to make our labor laws equitable to labor, to employers, and to the public.

Sincerely,

A. W. KIMBALL,
Director, Washington Office.

FAMILY LIFE—EDITORIAL FROM ALLIANCE (OHIO) REVIEW

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, the Alliance (Ohio) Review recently printed an interesting article entitled "Family Life," in which the merits of the marriage and divorce bill introduced by me were discussed at some length. I ask unanimous consent to have the article printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the article was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FAMILY LIFE

With a growing instability of family life, there is a wave of marriage and divorce legislation sweeping through State legislatures, with most of the proposed laws aimed at making divorce and remarriage after divorce more difficult.

The proposed laws provide a cooling-off period for divorce litigants, longer residence requirements before suits can be brought, longer waits for remarriage. A few States are conducting studies as a basis for more positive legislation, such as marriage education and counseling and reconciliation activities.

With no Federal uniform divorce law, the State laws of a prohibitive nature will affect only those citizens financially unable to avail themselves of the Gretna Greens and divorce mills in other States. Most authorities on divorce agree that the most effective legal approach to the problem is a Federal law fixing the grounds of divorce, the cooling-off period, and the limitations on remarriage.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER'S 24-year-old bill, providing for a constitutional amendment to permit such a law, has much public backing, and has a chance of serious consideration in this Congress.

The rising divorce rate—now at one divorce to every four marriages—is generally recognized as more than a postwar reaction. It has been developing since 1900 and is closely related to the great economic and social changes that have been taking place and that were accelerated by two World Wars.

Also, high standards of marriage relationships help account for more marriage failures. So much is involved in strengthening marriage and family life that legislation concerning it cannot afford to be hasty, superficial, or piecemeal. It is pointed out that such legislation is likely to be effective largely to the extent that it helps people to progress in the laggard and neglected field of human relationships.

NOMINATION OF LOUIS J. O'MARR, ASSOCIATE COMMISSIONER, INDIAN CLAIMS COMMISSION

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from Sheridan (Wyo.) Press commenting upon the nomination of Mr. Louis J. O'Marr, of Wyoming, to be Associate Commissioner, Indian Claims Commission, and quoting statements from other newspapers speaking in the highest terms of his qualifications. I request that the editorial be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

There being no objection, the editorial was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRAISE O'MARR SELECTION

A number of Wyoming newspapers have joined in commending the appointment by the President of Louis J. O'Marr of Sheridan as a member of the Indian Claims Commission.

"Wyoming knows that no one is better qualified to fill this responsible judicial position than the man who has just completed 4 years as attorney general of the State," the Wyoming Eagle of Cheyenne comments editorially. "His record in this State office has been such that he has won the praise of jurists and attorneys, and his fairness and impartiality won the confidence and respect of the political opposition. Before coming to Cheyenne in 1943, Mr. O'Marr had won distinction as a member of the Sheridan County and Wyoming State bar."

The Wyoming State Tribune is among the others to offer its commendation on the O'Marr appointment. Its editorial follows:

"The Union's Indian population is to be congratulated upon the appointment of Louis J. O'Marr of Wyoming as a member of the three-man Indian Claims Commission.

"There are not higher-grade men than the gentleman from Sheridan who has served as Wyoming's attorney general during the last 4 years.

"The Indian Claims Commission handles all matters of dispute between Indian tribes and between Indians and the Government of the United States.

"With Mr. O'Marr as a member of the Commission, any and all disputants may be assured of fair and impartial consideration of their claims.

"While necessarily absent in pursuit of the duties of his new office, Mr. O'Marr remains legally a resident of Wyoming.

"He is a citizen in whom the State validly may take pride."

THE POSTAL DEFICIT

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter I have received this morning from George Cutler, editor, the Open Pouch, New York Branch, Railway Mail Association, entitled "That Postal Deficit."

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE OPEN POUCH,
NEW YORK BRANCH,
RAILWAY MAIL ASSOCIATION,
New York, N. Y., March 24, 1947.

Senator WILLIAM LANGER,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

THAT POSTAL DEFICIT

In each session of Congress since 1945, the affiliated postal groups have been vitally interested in the enactment into law of the several bills designed to adjust Public Law 134 in accord with the needs and just deserts of the postal employees.

The greatest obstacle in our path, judging from comments of responsible Members of Congress, is apparently the $287,000,000 deficit estimated by the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1948. In simple justice to the loyal and hard-working postal employees, the relationship, if any, of such a deficit to the passage of corrective and sorely-needed legislation should be carefully examined.

The truth of the matter is, of course, that it is the Congress and not the postal employee that determines whether or not there shall be a deficit and, if so, just how large it shall be. The factors going into the make-up of any deficit are completely outside the purview and control of any postal employee and, indeed, quite beyond the powers of the officials of the Post Office Department. Since it is the Congress that sets the rates at which the postal service shall operate, it is obviously the Congress and not the Post Office Department or its employees that create or enlarge a deficit. To go a step further, the Congress is therefore in the indefensible position of being responsible for the deficit at the same time that it points to that very deficit as the major reason for refusing the admittedly just and modest requests of the united postal organizations.

Just how unfair and far-reaching this basis for judging the equity of proposed legislation can be, may be seen from the statistics which show that during the past 120 years the post office has operated at a profit only 7 percent of the time and at a loss 93 percent of the time. At a time when postal business is on the boom, the Government is losing money on second- and third-class mail, on parcel post, money orders, registered and insured mail, special delivery and c. o. d. service, and other services.

The postal employees, and their representative organizations, have no brief to present as to the rates to be charged for the very efficient services provided by the Department. Their primary interest is, as it should be, in providing the best services possible with the facilities granted them by the Congress, and in accord with the wishes of the Congress. It is only when the question of postal rates, as set by Congress, is utilized as an unfair criterion of postal working conditions, that we feel the opinions of those most familiar with the inner workings of our great postal service may be of some value to those primarily responsible for its financial operation.

Stated simply, the matter resolves itself to a congressional decision of whether the Post Office Department is, or ought to be, a business designed to operate for profit or whether it is to be considered a governmental service (such as the Public Health Service) constituted primarily for the benefit of the general public with the cost of that service logically met by public taxes.

Let us examine the operation of the Department under both premises. Operated as a business, under business principles, with the express intention of at least insuring that income meets outgo, would mean a drastic departure from past procedure. This can readily be seen from the following:

1. First class letter mail is the only activity of the post office that "pays its way" and this is the postal service used mostly by the general public.

2. Second class privileges as provided for publishers of newspapers and magazines for the period ending June 30, 1947, showed a net loss of some $33,000,000; the 1 cent rate on postal cards accounted for a loss of some $20,000,000; the service provided for other second-, third-, and fourth-class matter drove the total upward an additional $115,000,000.

3. The so-called free services provided by the Department each year amounts to $114,000,000. In this category are included the congressional franking privileges, the abolition of zone rates for certain types of reading matter, bond sales, other governmental agency free mailings, and the special services rendered below cost; such as money orders, postal notes, special delivery and c. o. d. service, registered and insured mail, etc.

Even a cursory examination of these figures demonstrates that by and large the postal deficit is the result of congressional action granting indirect subsidies to many types of business firms, as well as services to the general public that could not possibly be duplicated at the same cost by private enterprises. Again, it must be admitted that the propriety of providing such services below cost for whatever reason is the responsibility of the Congress. It is only when the existence of such low-cost services is used as a justification to deny postal employees their full due, that it is necessary or desirable to call attention to the inapplicability of such reasoning.

If we as postal employees, imbued with the concept of more and better service to our ultimate employers—the public—must take a stand, that stand surely is on the side of those who regard the primary function of the Department to be faster and better service to the public, with cost important but secondary.

As an example: Railroad services and, consequently direct mail service in many rural communities have been severely curtailed or entirely eliminated due to unfavorable financial experiences with the smaller lines in less populated areas. The Post Office Department, at considerable expense and with admirable ingenuity, has evolved a novel and economical highway post office which is calculated to provide for our rural communities' postal service appropriate to their needs. To date, this service has been largely in the blue-print stage because the funds to make this needed service a reality have not been available. The highway post office, if inaugurated on a scale equal to its needs, could never hope to pay its way. Yet it is to be doubted whether any Congressman would state that our rural citizens are not entitled to equitable service, regardless of cost.

The special services of the Department are also ground for legitimate scrutiny by the Congress. Here we find, by directive of the Congress, the Post Office Department in direct and somewhat unfair competition with private enterprise. The March 11 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD carried a plea from the publisher of a small-town newspaper pointing out that the post office was providing printing services on prestamped envelopes far below the price possible for a private printer to meet. The same is true of such services as mentioned above: Postal notes at a rate with which no private firm could possibly compete; books formerly distributed through private expediting houses now go by parcel post at a rate that insures that the greater the volume the greater the loss to the Government.

Yet this very liberality in the mail rate of printed matter is one of the major factors in the American people's enviable position as the best informed, most literate people in the world. We may well hesitate before taking any steps which might injure this position, for it is true, indeed, that this widespread dissemination of knowledge is one of the cornerstones of our liberty.

Finally, there is yet another facet of the practice of placing the needs of the postal employee in competition with the departmental finances over which he exercises no control. The physical working conditions under which he is expected to provide the service for which he is justly respected—conditions never too favorable—have deteriorated during the war years to a hitherto unknown degree. Here, once again, the postal deficit looms as the obstacle to prevent the offices of the Second and Fourth Assistant Postmaster Generals from improving working conditions which would call for Government condemnation if imposed by private industry upon its employees.

If we may presume, we would like to offer a word of caution. Too great a stress on high rates will not only make the services of the Department economically unavailable to many business firms and individuals, but will soon run afoul of the sound principle of diminishing returns. To fall into this error would be poor economy and bad business.

Let our position as postal employees not be misunderstood: We believe that these are legitimate services of the post office and services to which the public and business are entitled. Our contention is that the Congress must determine its policy and be conscious of and ready to assume the responsibility of its decision. In the light of this responsibility for determining the proper function of the postal service, Congress should not make its economies by its treatment of those whose sole responsibility and pride is in the conduct of the United States Post Office as the greatest and most efficient in the world.

GEORGE CUTLER,
Editor, the Open Pouch.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. BRIDGES, from the Committee on Appropriations:

H. J. Res. 154. Joint resolution making an appropriation for expenses incident to the control and eradication of foot-and-mouth disease and rinderpest; without amendment (Rept. No. 65).

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 27), to provide for suspending the enforcement of certain obligations against the operators of gold and silver mines who are forced to cease operations because of the war, was announced as first in order.

Mr. WHITE. Over.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 597) to protect American agriculture, horticulture, livestock, by prohibiting the importation of garbage derived from products originating outside of the United States was announced as next in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Over.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I inquire what happened to House bill 597.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. House bill 597 was passed over.

TRIAL PIECES OF COINS

The bill (S. 565) to amend section 3539 of the Revised Statutes relating to taking trial pieces of coins, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of the bill?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill was introduced and reported by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. FLANDERS].

Mr. FLANDERS. This bill, Mr. President, relates purely to a technical matter relating to the taking of trial pieces of coins. The present requirement is that the Treasury or the mint take one piece out of every 2,000 silver coins minted. That regulation or statute was enacted in 1873. During the year preceding its adoption only 9,524,000-odd pieces were minted. Therefore less than 5,000 pieces had to be reserved for test by the Annual Assay Commission. Since that time the coinage of silver reached the total of 396,637,401 pieces in 1945. Nothing in the results of the analysis indicates that it is necessary to reserve 198,300 silver pieces in order to make sure that the standard of silver content is maintained. It is obviously an absurd practice to continue the present ratio which was established, as I have said, in 1873 and it is therefore proposed in the bill to raise the number from 1 in every 2,000 silver coins to 1 in every 10,000, and thus do away with a considerable amount of unnecessary work.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill (S. 565) to amend section 3539 of the Revised Statutes, relating to trial pieces of coins, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3539 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (U. S. C., title 31, sec. 352), is amended by striking out the word "two" wherever it appears therein and inserting in lieu thereof the word "ten."

Mr. McCARRAN subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to revert to order of business 36, Senate bill 565.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill was passed.

Mr. McCARRAN. I ask unanimous consent to revert to it.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent that the Senate revert to order of business 36, Senate bill 565, which the clerk will state by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 565) to amend section 3539 of the Revised Statutes relating to taking trial pieces of coins.

Mr. TAFT. A point of order, Mr. President. The bill has been passed, and it will take a motion to reconsider the vote by which it was passed.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada is asking unanimous consent to revert to it.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I did not hear the bill read at the time it was taken up. The next bill on the calendar was explained by its author, but I did not hear Senate bill 565 explained. Until I have an explanation, I am going to object.

Mr. TAFT. A point of order. The Senator will have to move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. McCARRAN. I ask unanimous consent that the vote be reconsidered until we can have an explanation. Probably I shall have no objection at the next call of the calendar.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. As the Chair understands, the Senator from Nevada has asked that the action of the Senate be vacated and that the bill be restored to the calendar, rather than file a motion for reconsideration.

Mr. McCARRAN. That is correct.

Mr. TAFT. I object to that.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is heard. The clerk will continue the call of the calendar.

Mr. McCARRAN. I now enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which Senate bill 565 was passed.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be entered.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 566) to amend sections 3533 and 3536 of the Revised Statutes with respect to deviations in standard of ingots and weight of silver coins was announced as next in order.

Mr. McCARRAN. Over.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 110) to amend the Interstate Commerce Act with respect to certain agreements between carriers was announced as next in order.

Mr. TOBEY and other Senators. Over.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

ANNUAL AND SICK LEAVE FOR RURAL LETTER CARRIERS

The bill (S. 547) to provide for annual and sick leave for rural letter carriers was announced as next in order.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of that bill?

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, the bill is very brief. It simply provides as follows:

The authorized absence of a rural carrier on Saturdays which occur within or at the beginning or end of a period of sick or annual leave of five or more days' duration shall be without charge to such leave or loss of compensation: Provided, That only 4 days' continuous leave shall be necessary to permit the exclusion of Saturday as a charge against the carrier's leave when a holiday falls within the period of the leave.

It puts the rural carrier in the same category as any other civil-service employee.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill which had been reported from the Committee on Civil Service with amendments.

The first committee amendment was on page 1, line 5, after the word "following", to strike out "statement" and insert "paragraph."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 1, line 6, after "Annual Leave" to strike out:

Rural carriers are included in the provisions of this section and are hereby granted 15 days' leave of absence with pay; exclusive of Saturdays, Sundays, and holidays, each fiscal year and sick leave with pay at the rate of 10 days per year, exclusive of Saturdays, Sundays, and holidays, to be cumulative. Rural carriers on annual or sick leave shall be paid for Saturdays, Sundays, and holidays at the regular rate of pay.

And insert:

The authorized absence of a rural carrier on Saturdays which occur within or at the beginning or end of a period of sick or annual leave of five or more days' duration shall be without charge to such leave or loss of compensation: Provided, That only 4 days' continuous leave shall be necessary to permit the exclusion of Saturday as a charge against the carrier's leave when a holiday falls within the period of the leave.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 2, after line 10, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 2. This act shall take effect February 1, 1947.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I inquire how the amendments affect the bill?

Mr. LANGER. The bill, as amended, would place the rural carriers in the same category as other civil-service employees. It would permit Saturdays to be added to the 4 days' period.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 6 of Public Law 134, Seventy-ninth Congress, chapter 274, first session, is hereby amended by adding the following paragraph to section 6 under the title "Annual Leave":

"The authorized absence of a rural carrier on Saturdays which occur within or at the beginning or end of a period of sick or annual leave of 5 or more days' duration shall be without charge to such leave or loss of compensation: Provided, That only 4 days' continuous leave shall be necessary to permit the exclusion of Saturday as a charge against the carrier's leave when a holiday falls within the period of the leave."

SEC. 2. This act shall take effect February 1, 1947.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 865) to provide for the striking of medals in lieu of coins for commemorative purposes was announced as next in order.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of the bill, please?

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, this bill was introduced in lieu of at least six, and I think seven, bills previously introduced which provided for the minting of commemorative coins. It was indicated from the testimony given with respect to these bills that if they were passed still more bills of a similar nature would be introduced. The fact that the President has indicated that he would veto bills of this nature in view of their growing volume has led the Committee on Banking and Currency to introduce Senate bill 865, which provides for the same services by the Treasury at cost for the minting of medals in lieu of coins for commemorative purposes.

Mr. WILEY. Is it the sum and substance of the bill that States like Wisconsin, for instance, which will celebrate this year its one hundredth anniversary, are to be precluded from having coins struck by the Treasury to commemorate such events? Is the committee by this bill laying down a policy, or what is it doing?

Mr. FLANDERS. The bill lays down a policy that no coins which are legal tender shall be struck, but that the services of the Mint shall be at the disposal of the good people of Wisconsin and other States for the minting of corresponding commemorative medals.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLANDERS. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. Of course, Congress always can change the policy in the case of an extraordinary desire on its part to do so.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, if the only reason that can be given is that members of the committee are afraid the President will veto bills providing for minting commemorative coins, I personally feel that that is not an adequate reason for declining to accede to the request of an independent commonwealth like my own State. I have heretofore spoken of the subject. If once in 100 years the Federal Government, which wants to assist the States, cannot strike a commemorative coin for a State, then it would seem to me that there is something rotten in Denmark.

The State of Wisconsin has 3,200,000 population. It has a history dating back to the early days of the Nation. For 100 years the best people of Europe, the French, the Germans, the Scandinavians, the Irish, the Scotch, and others, have come into Wisconsin and made it the great State it is today.

The legislature of the State adopted a resolution asking that it be privileged to buy a half million 50-cent pieces, paying $250,000 for them. To comply with the request would not cost the Government one cent.

Mr. President, in connection with the discussion of this matter, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a copy of a letter which, under date of February 28, 1947, I addressed to the President of the United States.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
February 28, 1947.

Hon. HARRY S. TRUMAN,
President of the United States,
White House, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I have read your letter of February 26, addressed to the chairman of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, in which you suggest the striking of commemorative medals in place of commemorative coins for certain historical events, and indicate your disapproval of the coinage proposal.

I am, of course, deeply interested in this subject, primarily because of the bill which I have introduced, S. 126, which, as amended, would authorize the Director of the Mint to strike 500,000 fifty-cent silver coins, which would be sold to the State treasurer or other duly authorized representative of the State of Wisconsin, for sale in connection with Wisconsin's celebration in 1948 of the one hundredth anniversary of her admission to the Union.

I have noted the objections raised by both Presidents Hoover and Roosevelt to the striking of commemorative coins, as well as the reasons which you personally advance. It seems to me, with all due respect, that the various reasons do not, however, justify in the present circumstances a negative stand on the part of the executive branch to these coinage proposals. I would like to make the following points, which I earnestly submit to you, and which I hope will stimulate a more favorable view on your part and on the part of the Treasury Department to the commemorative-coin idea:

1. The minting of these coins does not cost the Federal Government one cent, since the full cost of the manufacture is borne by the appropriate historical authority, which buys them at their legal-tender value and sells them at a premium. This is in contrast to the countless proposals sponsored by the present and previous administrations, which have resulted in tremendous indebtedness to the National Government without accompanying favorable effects on the States. It seems to me that it ill behooves an administration which has caused vast indebtedness in wasteful activities to reject a proposal which will not cost the American taxpayers a penny, but will instead serve to create values—to encourage trade and commerce.

2. The commemorative coin in the case of the celebration of a State's centennial could be a real boon to the State governments, particularly in these days of centralization in Washington when States' prestige has been lowered by constant Federal intervention. In the case of S. 126, a State of some 3,125,000 persons would be enabled to finance its centennial celebration principally through this coinage device. There would result new prestige and respect on the part of Badger citizens, who are already devoted to our State government, but who would have even greater appreciation of their State's history, progress, and future.

3. The claim that the coinage of commemorative coins results in counterfeiting of them seem to be a shallow excuse for poor enforcement activities of Government anticounterfeiting agents. I well recognize that a wide variety of designs might contribute in a small way to counterfeiting. Nevertheless, it seems to me that if enforcement authorities are on their toes, and if penalties for counterfeiting are sufficiently stringent and are so enforced, the counterfeiting possibility need not be a real obstacle to minting of these commemorative coins.

4. The alternative proposal of commemorative medals is grossly inadequate to the purpose of financing such a celebration as Wisconsin contemplates, in view of the facts, among others, that the medals have no legal tender value, that the number of collectors of same is relatively limited in comparison to the number of coin collectors, and that a serious burden would fall on the State if a residue of medals were left unsold, in view of the fact that they have no legal-tender value.

5. I well recognize that a line must be drawn in order to prevent the unlimited striking of these commemorative coins. I see no reason why the Congress cannot establish effective standards which would bar minting of these coins for trivial purposes. It seems to me that the Congress of the United States has enough discrimination and judgment to establish such standards. Certainly, within those standards should be provision for coins to mark anniversaries of States' admission into the Union or as Territorial governments. Is it too much to ask that once or twice in 100 years a State government, such as Wisconsin, be aided by the Federal Government in this small manner without resulting cost to the taxpayer, but with great prestige resulting to the State government in its work?

I have written primarily in terms of Wisconsin's need for the commemorative coin, and in so doing, I sincerely feel that I am speaking for the citizens of Wisconsin and for their elected officials who have, in communications to me, unanimously endorsed my bill. I am definitely not asking any special favors for Wisconsin; that has never been the policy of our State, nor its people, nor of myself. All I am asking is that Wisconsin share in being allowed to buy these coins for sale to its citizens and friends as any other State, celebrating a similar anniversary, should be so entitled.

Admittedly, we are establishing a precedent here and, if this measure goes through, we are breaking with the tradition set up by Presidents Hoover and Roosevelt. But in so doing, we shall be acting upon what I believe is "evidence so conclusive and argument so clear," to use Lincoln's words, that we are justified in breaking with the past.

In the light of these facts, may I earnestly recommend to you that you reconsider your suggestion. Or, if you do not believe the facts warrant such reconsideration, may I recommend that, if the Congress passes the bill, in spite of your objection, that you do not exercise your power of veto in connection with it.

With assurances of high esteem and personal admiration, I am,

Sincerely yours,

ALEXANDER WILEY.

We have a mint; we have plenty of silver. We have the facilities. We have the men to do the work; but apparently we want them to sit around doing nothing.

I am very seriously concerned about this question. Why? First, if such a coin were struck off, the Federal Government would receive 50 cents for it. That commemorative piece would probably be worth $2.50 in the hands of the treasurer of the State of Wisconsin. That would leave a margin of $2 for the creation of wealth. Coin collectors throughout the country would want the coin. With the additional money the State could stage a celebration. Once in a hundred years we ask for such a thing; but the Federal Government cannot be constructively helpful.

Mr. President, I ask that the bill go over.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

DAYLIGHT-SAVING TIME FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The bill (S. 736) authorizing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to establish daylight-saving time in the District of Columbia during 1947 was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERTON. Let the bill go over.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator will withhold his objection until the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. MCGRATH] can explain the bill. If the bill is to be passed at all, it will probably have to be passed under the 5-minute rule. Will the Senator withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. OVERTON. I am glad to withhold the objection.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Ohio for making this request on my behalf. I had hoped that Senators might see their way clear not to object to the consideration of this measure at this time, because there is a very serious time element involved. If the District of Columbia is to have daylight-saving time this year, there is much yet to be done. We must take action here, which must be concurred in by the House.

I invite the attention of Senators to the fact that the bill would not of itself establish daylight-saving time for the District of Columbia. It would merely give the Commissioners of the District of Columbia the right to hold hearings—and I assume that such hearings would be rather extensive—to determine whether, in the light of all the considerations that might come before the Commissioners, they should establish daylight-saving time for the District of Columbia.

We have held extensive hearings on the bill. The first bill which I introduced provided that the Congress itself should establish daylight-saving time for the District of Columbia. It was determined that the very many and intricate problems which had to be faced as we considered the proposal required that some specialized attention be given to it. The bill before us is not really a daylight-saving bill in the true sense of the word. It is merely a bill granting a very small degree of home rule to the District of Columbia.

I am sure that all Senators are in agreement that in a matter of this kind, which so vitally and intimately affects the lives of the people who live here, we should give them some consideration. If they wish to establish daylight-saving time, which so materially affects their lives, they should have the opportunity to have it.

There has been a great demand for legislation of this kind. As I have stated, the Committee on the District of Columbia heard much testimony, and unanimously reported the bill to the Senate. In support of the measure there appeared before the committee representatives of all the newspapers in the District of Columbia, all the radio stations, and all the civic organizations. The Committee on the District of Columbia has received 4,330 letters on the issue. Three thousand three hundred and three of them were in favor of the passage of this permissive legislation. There were only 1,027 letters against it.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McGRATH. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. The distinguished Senator could answer several questions. As I understand, all the bill would do would be to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, if in their wisdom they found it advisable, to place in operation daylight saving in the District of Columbia. As I understand, the bill would confer no extraterritorial jurisdiction whatever.

Mr. McGRATH. It is strictly limited to the District of Columbia. Of course, one of the problems with which the Commissioners will have to deal is the relationship with neighboring communities. However, the bill does not undertake to confer any jurisdiction whatsoever outside the boundaries of the District of Columbia. It is merely permissive legislation, giving the Commissioners the right, after holding hearings, if they deem it proper, to establish daylight-saving time for 1 year only. The bill applies only to the year 1947. During this period of time all the other great cities surrounding Washington will, for the most part, be operating on daylight-saving time.

Because the proposed legislation is permissive, and because it is in a sense a measure of home rule, I ask Senators to permit action to be taken upon it at this time.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McGRATH. I yield.

Mr. ELLENDER. Would the bill affect the hours of meeting of the two Houses of Congress? In other words, would we have to meet at 11 o'clock rather than 12?

Mr. McGRATH. No; we would meet at 12.

Mr. ELLENDER. That is, under the new daylight-saving time?

Mr. McGRATH. That is correct.

Mr. OVERTON rose.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. President, does the Senator wish me to yield to him?

Mr. OVERTON. No; I wish to be recognized in my own right.

Mr. McGRATH. Is the Senator still objecting?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana is entitled to 5 minutes under rule VIII.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, I have never been an advocate of daylight-saving time. I believe in letting nature take her course. I do not think we can improve on Old Sol, who regulates the time when we begin and cease our labors. Those who are ambitious and wish to get up early have a perfect right to do so. They can get up an hour earlier than the regular time, or 2 hours, or 3 hours earlier, if they so desire.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. They can stay up all night.

Mr. OVERTON. As my able friend from Oklahoma says, they can stay up all night.

Take the case of the Senate. It seems that the bill would not apply to the Senate. But it does apply to the Senate. We should be meeting at 11 o'clock instead of 12. Furthermore we shall have to get down to our offices at 7 o'clock in the morning, instead of 8, as Senators usually do. My clerical force would have to rise very early. They have work to do at home. They would have to get up an hour or two earlier in order to meet the requirement of the Commissioners.

I do not see why Congress cannot pass on this question or why we must be controlled by the views of the Commissioners. I have a very high regard for the present Commissioners of the District of Columbia, but I do not think that so important a question as regulating the time when I should get up, when I should go to bed, when I should eat my breakfast, and when I should eat my dinner, should be determined by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Furthermore, we would be out of line with the majority of cities of the United States. Some of them have daylight-saving time. However, all our radio programs would be out of line. I would not know when to listen to my favorite news commentators. I like to listen to my good friend Gabriel Heatter, who has a sonorous voice.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. OVERTON. I shall be glad to yield. Is the Senator on my side?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, radio schedules are based on New York time, so that the District of Columbia would have the advantage of being on the same time as is the city of New York, thereby permitting the Senator from Louisiana to hear his favorite program at the usual time.

Mr. OVERTON. Why should the Senate follow New York in everything? The Senate is an independent legislative body. Let it make up its own mind what it wants to do. If it wants daylight-saving time, let it consider the subject. Maybe it can save 2 hours instead of 1. It seems that everything has to be done in accordance with what New York wants. I think it is time for this august body to assert its own independence. I do not believe we can improve on nature. So far as I am concerned, if daylight-saving time is established for the District of Columbia, I shall place a sign on my office to the effect that room 315 is not subject to daylight-saving time and, instead of arriving at my office at 10 o'clock, according to daylight-saving time, I shall arrive there at 11 o'clock in the morning. I assume that the proposal, if adopted, would interfere with committee meetings. The Commissioners' determination will affect committee meetings. To determine when committees of the Senate shall meet, when Senators shall go to lunch, and when they shall do this or do that, and to regulate our lives, is a vast authority to lodge with the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. Let the Senate assert its independence now. I object.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McGRATH. I want to give notice that at the first appropriate time I shall ask for the consideration of and a vote on this bill. My inquiry is as to whether or not such a motion is in order at this time or at the end of the calendar?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under rule VIII, the Senator is permitted to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill now, regardless of objection; and the motion must be decided without debate.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. President, then I move that the Senate proceed now to the consideration of Senate bill 736.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. TAFT. If this motion should carry, is the call of the calendar interrupted at this time?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The call of the calendar is interrupted, under rule VIII, and the limitation of debate is removed.

Mr. TAFT. Then the Senate may proceed with debate upon this bill?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without limitation. The yeas and nays having been ordered, the clerk will call the roll.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of a quorum having been suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hawkes	O'Conor
Baldwin	Hayden	O'Daniel
Ball	Hickenlooper	O'Mahoney
Barkley	Hill	Overton
Brewster	Hoey	Pepper
Bricker	Holland	Reed
Bridges	Ives	Revercomb
Buck	Johnson, Colo.	Robertson, Va.
Bushfield	Johnston, S.C.	Russell
Butler	Kilgore	Saltonstall
Byrd	Knowland	Smith
Cain	Langer	Sparkman
Capehart	Lodge	Stewart
Capper	McCarran	Taft
Chavez	McCarthy	Taylor
Connally	McClellan	Thomas, Okla.
Donnell	McFarland	Thomas, Utah
Downey	McGrath	Thye
Dworshak	McKellar	Tobey
Eastland	McMahon	Umstead
Ecton	Magnuson	Vandenberg
Ellender	Malone	Watkins
Ferguson	Martin	Wherry
Flanders	Maybank	White
Fulbright	Millikin	Wiley
Green	Moore	Williams
Gurney	Morse	Wilson
Hatch	Murray	Young

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. President, so that my motion may not interfere with the program which has been set for the Senate this afternoon, at this time I withdraw the motion, giving notice that at the first appropriate moment after the call of the calendar I shall renew it.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the motion is withdrawn, and therefore the order for the yeas and nays is vacated.

The clerk will resume the calling of the calendar.

JOINT RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 58) to extend the powers and authorities under certain statutes with respect to the distribution and pricing of sugar, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ELLENDER. Let the joint resolution go over.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be passed over.

PARTICIPATION IN INTERNATIONAL REFUGEE ORGANIZATION

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 77) providing for membership and participation by the United States in the International Refugee Organization and authorizing an appropriation therefor was announced as next in order.

Mr. ELLENDER. Let the joint resolution go over.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to make a brief statement relative to this matter.

We have about 90 days left in which to arrange for meeting our responsibility for approximately 600,000 displaced persons in Germany. Except that action on this joint resolution reaches its conclusion and the International Refugee Organization is set up promptly, we shall have to revert to Army responsibility for those displaced persons, and an entirely new arrangement will have to be created. In other words, it is vitally necessary that no further delay occur, but that we either vote this measure up or down.

Mr. President, the joint resolution came from the Foreign Relations Committee with unanimous support. The only controversy which arose in connection with it was as to whether it involves in any way any latitudes in respect to our immigration laws. It does not involve any such latitudes, Mr. President; and the committee invited those who feared it might do so to present their own amendment to make perfectly clear that it does not. Therefore, I think I am entitled to say there is no controversy regarding the joint resolution itself.

On the other hand, the distinguished Senator from West Virginia [Mr. REVERCOMB], is anxious to discuss the general subject of immigration which inevitably is related objectively to the discussion of the measure. He has agreed with me that if the joint resolution may be taken up as in legislative session when the Senate convenes tomorrow, he will be prepared to present his case. Inasmuch as I think that is the only controversy—in fact, it is not actually a controversy, because he is to speak in respect to the general subject—I am sure we shall be able to dispose of the matter very promptly tomorrow.

So I am suggesting, after discussing the subject with other Senators, that I am hopeful that, if possible, tomorrow noon, when the Senate convenes, we may resume legislative session, at least temporarily, in order to consider this joint resolution.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I too should like to see speedy action taken on this joint resolution. I agree with what the distinguished Senator from Michigan has said as to its importance, but I can hardly agree that, aside from the one indicated, there is no other controversy relative to the joint resolution. I wish to propound to the Senator from Michigan some questions about the provisions of the constitution of the International Relief Organization, under which this program would operate. I do not know that there will be controversy; but certainly I should like to have a complete explanation of the measure. When I ran through the constitution of the International Refugee Organization yesterday I was surprised at some of its provisions. One of them forbids help to persons of German ethnic origin. In the case of such persons, found in the displaced persons camps, I wonder whether they are to be classified as enemy, and, if they are, whether relief is to be afforded to such displaced persons. I have visited some of those camps and I know something of the racial extraction of the inmates. I certainly should not like to bar any one, regardless of origin, if he comes under the definition of "refugee," as we have defined it in the past 2 years.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, I have been very glad to agree that this subject be taken up tomorrow. I wish to say that insofar as the joint resolution itself is concerned, there is printed and lying on the desk at this time an amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. MCGRATH], and myself, and it has come from the Judiciary Committee.

So far as the joint resolution is concerned, while it may be agreed that there is no controversy about it, yet I do not wish a misunderstanding to arise or to have anyone labor under the misapprehension that we are not going to discuss very fully on the floor of the Senate, when this matter comes up, the provisions of the so-called constitution of the International Refugee Organization. I think there should be a very full disclosure of its contents. I feel, with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY], that it contains provisions, the meaning of which we should know before we consent to it and bind this country to it.

My principal interest has been, as a member of the Judiciary Committee and of its subcommittee on immigration, to see to it that nothing that is contained in the joint resolution, if it is passed, will result in the surrender of congressional control over immigration into the United States. The refugee problem is a serious one for the entire world, as well as for the United States; but at the same time we want no action taken—at least, that is my viewpoint—which would permit anyone to make an agreement with this organization under which persons could enter the United States contrary to our immigration laws.

So, Mr. President, when this question comes up for discussion tomorrow, I wish to say in fairness to the able chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, it will not simply be passed over quietly or speedily enacted without discussion, but we shall wish to have revealed every part of that constitution; and I say that today so that there will be no surprise about it tomorrow.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to speak for 2 minutes in reply.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Senator from Michigan may proceed.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, there is no desire to press for action on the International Refugee Organization matter without having the fullest information available to the Senate. The Senator from West Virginia has referred particularly to the immigration problem. He has an amendment pending, and if it does not cover the subject, that will be his fault, not mine. We shall accept his amendment.

There is no thought of extending the International Refugee Organization's authority into our immigration laws in any aspect. The delay for the last few weeks has been solely because of an effort on the part of a number of very earnest lawyers to agree upon language which is so airtight that there can be no possibility of invasion of the immigration laws by means of the measure we are asked to pass.

Inasmuch as the Senator from West Virginia is one of the authors of the saving clause which has been offered, I assume it can be depended upon as a totally successful saving clause, and I support it heartily.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I shall if I am permitted to do so. I have only 2 minutes.

Mr. HATCH. When the Senator from Michigan spoke about his own idea of accepting the amendment, I wished to add that he spoke not only for himself as chairman of the committee, but, I think, for the entire committee. There was no dissent whatever in the committee.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think that is so.

Mr. President, the phase of this matter submitted by the able Senator from West Virginia is very important. No one denies that to be a fact. In my opinion the amendment which he himself has sponsored is a complete and total answer to that phase. But I beg of Senators not to overlook the fact that there is another important phase, and that is that the American flag flies over 600,000 displaced persons in Germany and Austria, and the responsibility for the administration of that trust must be established within the next 90 days. We cannot wait any longer to determine what the answer is. Whatever it is, let us find out tomorrow.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to speak for 1 minute on the subject.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Senator may proceed.

Mr. REVERCOMB. I am fully aware of the seriousness of the refugee question, but I take this minute to say that I am delighted to have the statement made now upon the floor of the Senate by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and by another able member of that committee, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH]. The committee did not see fit to adopt the amendment when it was before them, and I am delighted that they have seen the light and are ready to accept it on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REVERCOMB. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I do not think that is a fair statement. There has not been a minute in the last 3 weeks when the Senator from Michigan has not said to the Senator from West Virginia that this amendment must be written satisfactorily to him. Is not that true?

Mr. REVERCOMB. Yes; and I gave the Senator from Michigan a copy of the amendment. It was taken by the able Senator, the chairman—and I know he was earnest about it—before the committee, but it was not adopted.

Mr. VANDENBERG. It was not adopted because the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary and other colleagues of the Senator from Massachusetts on his own committee thought the language written into the joint resolution was stronger than that submitted by him. That is the only reason why the situation was as I have stated. But we need have no controversy over the matter whatever. The Committee on Foreign Relations has just one object, and that is to make the language so completely airtight and copper-riveted that there can be no remote possibility of any change in our immigration laws as a result of the particular action proposed. Therefore I submit that the able Senator from West Virginia and I are in complete agreement, and we have not a thing on earth to quarrel about.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection has been heard to the consideration of the joint resolution at this time, and it will go over.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, in view of the statement made by the able Senator from Michigan, certainly at this moment there appears to be no disagreement, and I am delighted to have that information on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I should like to have unanimous consent for 1 minute, lest there be a misunderstanding as to the form of the amendment. I thought the amendment had been agreed upon, but I must say that if the Senator from West Virginia is going to present the same amendment he presented to the committee originally, I shall be bound to oppose that particular amendment merely on account of the form of the language contained in it. I do not want to have any misunderstanding about it.

Mr. REVERCOMB. The amendment is printed and is on the desk of the Senator.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will continue the call of the calendar.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WHERRY. Did the Chair state that objection had been made to the joint resolution?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood there was a request that it go over.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 2102) to provide for a 6-month extension and final liquidation of the farm labor supply program and for other purposes, was announced as next in order, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert certain language.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I have an amendment lying on the desk which I desire to offer.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, line 25, and page 4, line 5, it is proposed to strike out "or December 31, 1947, whichever is the earlier" and insert in lieu thereof "or January 30, 1948, whichever is the earlier."

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I am quite sure that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. KEM] asked that the record of the hearings on this bill be printed, did he not, at the last call of the calendar? I should like to know whether that has been done. Some such request was made by the distinguished Senator from Missouri. I am not sure what it was.

Mr. YOUNG. The order has been made. I do not know whether the hearings have been printed or not.

Mr. WHERRY. Am I to understand, then, that there is no objection on the part of the Senator from Missouri to the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, I ask that the bill go over.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

LIQUIDATION OF SELECTIVE SERVICE SYSTEM

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 918) to establish an Office of Selective Service Records to liquidate the Selective Service System following the termination of its functions on March 31, 1947, and to preserve and service the selective-service records, and for other purposes, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby established an Office of Selective Service Records, to be headed by a Director who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall receive compensation at the rate of $10,000 per year.

SEC. 2. The functions, duties, and responsibilities of the Office of Selective Service Records shall be (a) to liquidate the Selective Service System, which liquidation shall be completed as rapidly as possible after March 31, 1947, but in any event not later than March 31, 1948, except as herein provided; (b) to preserve and service the records of Selective Service; and (c) to perform such other duties relating to the preservation of records, knowledge, and methods of Selective Service, not inconsistent with law.

SEC. 3. The unexpended balances of funds available to the Selective Service System are hereby made available to the Office of Selective Service Records for the purposes of this act and such additional appropriations as are necessary therefor are hereby authorized.

SEC. 4. (a) All property, records, and personnel of the Selective Service System are hereby transferred to the Office of Selective Service Records.

(b) Authority is hereby granted to the Director of the Office of Selective Service Records to transfer, without reimbursement, and with the approval of the War Assets Administration, to the National Guard in the several States, the District of Columbia, and Territories and possessions of the United States, or to the Organized Reserves of the armed forces, surplus property of the Selective Service System: Provided, That no surplus property will be so transferred by the Director of the Office of Selective Service Records prior to July 1, 1947.

SEC. 5 (a) Pursuant to the third sentence of section 7 of Public Law 473, approved June 29, 1946, all functions and responsibilities of the Personnel Division, National Headquarters, Selective Service System, established under authority of section 8 (g) of the Selective Training and Service Act of 1940, as amended, together with so much of the records of the Selective Service System, and so much of the unexpended balances of appropriations of the Selective Service System, as the Director of the Bureau of the Budget may determine to relate primarily to such functions, are hereby transferred, effective March 29, 1947, from the Selective Service System to the Secretary of Labor.

(b) The second sentence of section 600 (a) of Public Law 346, approved June 22, 1944, is hereby amended by substituting the words "Director of the Office of Selective Service Records" for the words "Director of the National Selective Service System."

(c) Section 600 (c) of Public Law 346, approved June 22, 1944, is hereby amended by substituting the words "Office of Selective Service Records" for the words "Veterans' Personnel Division, National Selective Service System."

SEC. 6. (a) The Director is authorized—

(1) to prescribe the necessary rules and regulations to carry out the provisions of this act;

(2) to create and establish local record depots in the several States, the District of Columbia, Territories and possessions of the United States, and such other agencies as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act. There shall be created one or more local record depots in each county or political subdivision corresponding thereto of each State, the District of Columbia, Territories and possessions of the United States. Each local record depot shall be under the administration of a local board, consisting of the members of the present Selective Service local boards, and shall consist of three or more members. Any vacancy on such board shall be filled by the Director upon recommendation of the Governors or comparable executive officials: Provided, That the Director may establish intercounty local record depots for an area not exceeding five counties within a State or comparable jurisdiction when the Director determines, after considering the public interest involved, and the recommendations of the Governors or comparable executive official or officials, that the establishment of such a local record depot area will result in a more efficient and economical operation. One member from each of the appointed county local boards involved in such intercounty local record depot area shall form such board, and shall have the same authority and jurisdiction as a local board in its area;

(3) to create and establish, on the date hereinafter specified, Federal record depots in the several States, the District of Columbia, Territories, and possessions of the United States, and to maintain such other offices as may be necessary for the purposes of this act;

(4) to utilize the agencies of the Federal Government with the consent of the heads thereof, and to accept the services of all officers and agents of the several States, the District of Columbia, Territories, and possessions of the United States, and subdivisions thereof, in the execution of this act;

(5) to appoint and fix the compensation of such officers and employees, as may be necessary for the purposes of this act, with or without regard to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended;

(6) to delegate and provide for the delegation of any authority vested in him under this act to such officers, agents, or persons as he may designate or appoint for such purpose or as may be designated or appointed for such purpose pursuant to such rules and regulations as he may prescribe.

(b) In the administration of this act voluntary services may be accepted.

(c) The Chief of Finance, United States Army, is hereby designated, empowered, and directed to act as the fiscal, disbursing, and accounting agent of the Director of the Office of Selective Service Records in carrying out the provisions of this act.

(d) Any officer on the active or retired list of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard, or of any Reserve component thereof, or any officer or employee of any department or agency of the United States who may be assigned or detailed to any office or position to carry out the provisions of this act may serve in and perform the functions of such office or position without loss of or prejudice to his status as such officer in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard or Reserve component thereof, or as such officer or employee in any department or agency of the United States.

SEC. 7. The Director is authorized to prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary to preserve the confidential nature of the individual confidential records previously obtained under the Selective Training and Service Act of 1940, as amended. Any person charged with the duty of carrying out any of the provisions of this act, and who fails to carry out such provisions or who shall knowingly violate the regulations promulgated under this section shall, upon conviction in the district court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, be punished by imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or a fine of not more than $10,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment, or if subject to military or naval law, may be tried by court martial, and, on conviction, shall suffer such punishment as the court martial may direct.

SEC. 8. Except as provided in this act, all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby suspended to the extent of such conflict for the period in which this act shall be in force.

SEC. 9. (a) Except as otherwise provided by the terms of this act, the provisions hereof shall take effect at 12 o'clock postmeridian, March 31, 1947.

(b) The provisions of section 6 (a) (2) of this act shall become inoperative and cease to apply at 12 o'clock postmeridian on June 30, 1947, unless extended by the Congress prior to that date.

(c) The provisions of section 6 (a) (3) of this act shall become operative and effective upon the expiration date of section 6 (a) (2), as hereinbefore specified.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, as the Senator in charge of the bill, I present a corrective amendment to be inserted on page 2.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 12, before the word "personnel", it is proposed to strike out the word "civilian."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT NATIONAL PARK

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 731), to establish the Theodore Roosevelt National Park; to erect a monument in memory of Theodore Roosevelt in the village of Medora, N. Dak., and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of the bill? What is to be the cost to the Government?

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, this bill was considered in the committee when I, as chairman of the committee, was personally absent from the Senate and the committee hearing, so if an explanation is required from me at this time, for the reason stated I shall have to ask that the bill go over.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

JOINT RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 45) to change the name of Boulder Dam to Hoover Dam, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McCARRAN. Let the joint resolution go over.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be passed over.

CHANGE OF NAME OF LUGERT-ALTUS IRRIGATION PROJECT TO W. C. AUSTIN PROJECT

The bill (S. 214) to change the name of the Lugert-Altus irrigation project in the State of Oklahoma to the W. C. Austin project was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, in honor and recognition of the outstanding service of the late W. C. Austin in securing irrigation for the benefit of southwestern Oklahoma, the project in the State of Oklahoma known as the Lugert-Altus irrigation project shall hereafter be known and designated as the W. C. Austin project. Any law, regulation, document, or record of the United States in which such project is designated or referred to under the name of the Lugert-Altus irrigation project shall be held to refer to such project under and by the name of the W. C. Austin project.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 669) to provide for the payment of a bonus of 30 cents per bushel on wheat and corn produced and sold between January 1, 1945, and April 18, 1946, was announced as next in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Over.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

CONTINUATION OF COMMODITY CREDIT CORPORATION

The bill (S. 350) to continue the Commodity Credit Corporation as an agency of the United States until June 30, 1949, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Over.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his objection until an explanation of the necessity for the enactment of this measure can be made?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I object because this particular bill is tied in with Senate bill 669 which precedes it on the calendar. I am not prepared to discuss either of these bills today.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I do not think the bills have any relationship. The 30-cents-a-bushel provision goes back to a previous consideration, but the question as to whether the Commodity Credit Corporation shall continue seems to me a different question.

We have the obligation to pay 92½ percent of parity to certain farmers for many farm crops, and the only agency through which that can be effectively carried through is the Commodity Credit Corporation. I think it is a distinct question from the one involved in the bill preceding it on the calendar.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless the Senator desires to withdraw his objection, the discussion is not in order at this time.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, may I state to the distinguished Senator from Delaware that there is no connection at all between the two bills,

Mr. WILLIAMS. I still ask that the bill go over.

HERSCHEL V. JOHNSON

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 86) to authorize Herschel V. Johnson, Deputy Representative of the United States to the Security Council of the United Nations to be reappointed to the Foreign Service was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That, notwithstanding any provision of law to the contrary, Herschel V. Johnson, Deputy Representative of the United States to the Security Council of the United Nations, may continue in such office and be reappointed as a Foreign Service officer, in the class of career minister, and such reappointment may be effective as of November 25, 1946: Provided, That the total compensation to be paid him as a Foreign Service officer in the class of career minister and as Deputy Representative of the United States to the Security Council shall be that provided by law for a Foreign Service officer in the class of career minister or that provided by law for Deputy Representative of the United States to the Security Council, whichever is the higher.

PAUL A. SMITH

The bill (S. 874) to authorize the President to appoint Lt. Comdr. Paul A. Smith to the Interim Council of the Provisional International Civil Aviation Organization or its successor, and as representative of the United States to the Air Navigation Committee of the Provisional International Civil Aviation Organization without affecting his status and perquisites as an officer of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, notwithstanding the existing provisions of law or any rules or regulations issued thereunder, the President is authorized to appoint Lt. Comdr. Paul A. Smith, an officer in the Coast and Geodetic Survey, as alternate representative of the United States to the Interim Council of the Provisional International Civil Aviation Organization or its successor and as representative of the United States to the Air Navigation Committee of the Provisional International Civil Aviation Organization, and his appointment to, acceptance, and service as such alternate and representative shall in no way affect any status, office, rank, or grade he may occupy or hold in the Coast and Geodetic Survey of the United States or any emolument, perquisite, right, privilege, eligibility for promotion or retirement, or other benefits incident to or arising out of any such status, office, rank, or grade: Provided, That during the time he holds the office of alternate representative of the United States to the Interim Council of the Provisional International Civil Aviation Organization or its successor and representative of the United States to the Air Navigation Committee of the Provisional International Civil Aviation Organization he shall have the rank of rear admiral (lower half) of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and shall receive such compensation and allowances as the Secretary of State shall prescribe payable from appropriations made by law for the Department of State: Provided further, That so long as he remains alternate representative of the United States to the Interim Council of the Provisional International Civil Aviation Organization or its successor, and representative of the United States to the Air Navigation Committee of the Provisional International Civil Aviation Organization he shall retain his permanent rank and grade or such rank and grade to which he may be promoted by reason of his position on the lineal list of the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

SEC. 2. In the performance of his duties as alternate representative of the United States to the Interim Council of the Provisional International Civil Aviation Organization or its successor, and as representative of the United States to the Air Navigation Committee of the Provisional International Civil Aviation Organization, Lt. Comdr. Smith shall be subject to no supervision, control, restriction, or prohibition other than would be operative with respect to him if he were in no way connected with the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

MAJ. GEN. LAURENCE S. KUTER

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 875) to authorize the President to appoint Maj. Gen. Laurence S. Kuter as representative of the United States to the Interim Council of the Provisional International Civil Aviation Organization or its successor, without affecting his military status and perquisites, which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, notwithstanding the provisions of section 1222 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 10, sec. 576), and the provisions of section 1223 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 10, sec. 577), and the provisions of section 1224 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 10, sec. 495), or any other provisions of law, or any rules and regulations issued thereunder, the President is authorized to appoint Maj. Gen. Laurence S. Kuter, a general officer in the Army of the United States, as representative of the United States to the Interim Council of the Provisional International Civil Aviation Organization or its successor, and Major General Kuter's appointment to, acceptance of, and service as such representative shall in no way affect any status, office, rank, or grade he may occupy or hold in the Army of the United States or any component thereof, or any emolument, perquisite, right, privilege, eligibility, for promotion, or benefit incident to or arising out of any such status, office, rank, or grade: Provided, That so long as he remains United States representative to the Interim Council of the Provisional International Civil Aviation Organization or its successor, Major General Kuter in lieu of his military pay and allowances shall receive such compensation and allowances as the Secretary of State shall prescribe from appropriations made by law for the Department of State.

SEC. 2. In the performance of his duties as representative of the United States to the Interim Council of the Provisional International Civil Aviation Organization or its successor, Major General Kuter shall be subject to no supervision, control, restriction, or prohibition (military or otherwise) other than would be operative with respect to him if he were in no way connected with the War Department, the Military Establishment, or the Army of the United States, or any component thereof.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, may I ask the distinguished Senator from Michigan whether the three gentlemen mentioned in the last three measures are the ones who took part in the civil aviation conference held at Chicago about 2 years ago?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am unable to tell the Senator, since I do not have the file here, whether they served that particular function. I can tell him they are the best available experts at the present time to deal with the particular functions which are described, and I think there is no doubt that their services are highly essential. The sole purpose of this legislation really is to permit them to return to their Army status when their tasks are finished.

Mr. LANGER. I have no objection.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 2535) to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act was announced as next in order.

Mr. FERGUSON. Over.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

SYNTHETIC RUBBER PRODUCTION

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 118) to strengthen the common defense by maintaining an adequate domestic rubber-producing industry, which had been reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency with amendments.

The amendments were, on page 1, line 4, before the word "rubber", to strike out "Crude" and insert "Natural"; on line 11, to strike out "Crude" and insert "Natural"; on page 2, line 2, to strike out "crude" and insert "natural"; on line 10, to strike out "crude" and insert "natural"; on line 13, to strike out "crude" and insert "natural"; on line 23, to strike out "crude" and insert "natural"; on page 3, line 2, before "expandible", to strike out "rapid" and insert "rapidly"; on line 16, to strike out "crude" and insert "natural"; on page 3, line 23, after "notwithstanding," to strike out "any other provision of law, the provisions of section 2 (a) of the act of June 28, 1940, entitled "An act to expedite national defense and for other purposes" (54 Stat. 676), as amended, shall continue," and insert "the provisions of title XV of the Second War Powers Act, 1942, as amended, title III of such act and the amendments to existing law made by such title, shall remain"; on page 4, line 9, to strike out "crude" and insert "natural," and to strike out "crude" and insert "natural-"; on page 4, line 10, to strike out, in the parenthesis, "except," and insert "including import control of synthetic rubber and natural- and synthetic-rubber products, but excluding"; on page 4, line 12, to strike out "crude" and insert "natural"; on page 4, line 13, after "that" to insert "to the extent necessary to accomplish the purposes of this joint resolution"; on page 4, line 18, to strike out "crude" and insert "natural"; on page 4, line 19, to strike out "crude" and insert "natural"; on page 4, line 19, after "products" to insert "and import control of synthetic rubber and natural- and synthetic-rubber products"; on page 4, line 23, to strike out "crude" and insert "natural"; and on page 4, line 24, to strike out "(b) The powers, functions, duties, and authority of the United States to manufacture and sell synthetic rubber shall continue in force until the effective date of permanent legislation enacted to accomplish the policy set forth in section 1 (b) hereof, but in no event beyond March 31, 1948, and as so continued it is hereby directed that they shall be exercised and performed by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation while that Corporation has succession, and thereafter by such officer, agency, or instrumentality of the United States as the President may designate" and insert "(b) The powers, functions, duties, and authority of the United States to manufacture (including the conduct of research essential to the development of the synthetic-rubber industry) and sell synthetic rubber shall continue in force until the effective date of permanent legislation enacted to accomplish the policy set forth in section 1 (b) hereof, but in no event beyond March 31, 1948. There shall not be declared as surplus nor shall War Assets Administration dispose of any synthetic-rubber plant and facilities costing the Government in excess of $5,000,000, until the effective date of permanent legislation enacted to accomplish the policy set forth in section 1 (b) hereof: Provided, That there shall be exempt from such disposal limitations the neoprene plant, styrene plants, the petroleum butadiene plant located at Toledo, Ohio, not to exceed two alcohol butadiene plants, and butadiene-styrene type copolymer plants to the extent that the aggregate actual capacity of such copolymer plants remaining in Government ownership shall not be less than 600,000 long tons per year. It is hereby directed that the aforesaid powers, functions, duties, and authority of the United States to so manufacture and sell synthetic rubber shall be exercised and performed by Reconstruction Finance Corporation while that Corporation has succession and thereafter by such officer, agency, or instrumentality of the United States as the President may designate: Provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed as precluding any other agency of Government from engaging in research authorized by law."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of the joint resolution?

Mr. TOBEY. The purpose of the resolution is to extend Government controls on crude and synthetic rubber beyond the present expiration date of March 31, 1947, until such time as permanent legislation with respect to the maintenance of the synthetic-rubber program is enacted, but in no event beyond March 31, 1948.

The measure had extensive hearings before a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, of which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER] was chairman, and the distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] was an active, interested member. I am going to call on the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER] to explain the joint resolution.

Mr. BRICKER. Mr. President, this joint resolution will discontinue the Government purchase of crude rubber on the 31st day of March and will continue the Government controls over synthetic rubber. That includes the controls of the end-product formula, and the allocation, but permits private companies to purchase on their own account natural rubber in the foreign market.

There was considerable difference among the manufacturers as to whether or not the latter provision should be included. Most of them, I think, were in favor of a continuance of Government purchase after March 31 for a period of 5 or 6 months. A great majority of the committee, along with the representatives of the Government and the interdepartmental agency of the Government departments interested in rubber, recommended that it be discontinued as of March 31. In substance the joint resolution takes the Government out of the purchase of natural rubber on the 31st day of March, and continues the Government in complete control, as it has been since the beginning of the synthetic program, of the manufacture and utilization of synthetic rubber.

It does so upon the ground that it is essential for the national defense that the synthetic program be continued, and that the Government have complete control over that program, and the authority to require the utilization of synthetic products until such time as we are no longer dependent completely upon natural rubber. The last amendment provides for the sale of certain synthetic plants which the Government feels are no longer necessary for the conduct of the synthetic-rubber program. The remainder of the synthetic plants will be retained pending permanent legislation which may be enacted at this and the coming sessions.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, I would merely add, in amplifying the views just expressed by the Senator from Ohio, that when the war came on us, we were caught with a very scant supply of rubber; the stock pile was increased as much as possible; but we came through successfully because the science and ability and productive capacity of this country brought about the construction of great synthetic-rubber plants, with marvelous results. There were different processes of producing synthetic rubber.

A while ago, a prominent gentleman in this country advocated that when the war was over we should give up the making of synthetic rubber and resume trading again with the British and Dutch under their cartel arrangements, whereby from time immemorial they rigged the crude rubber market from 20 cents to $2 a pound. They piped and we danced.

Now we have the synthetic industry. It is today making synthetic rubber which, in many instances, is the equal, and in some cases the superior, of natural rubber. For certain uses natural rubber takes precedence, but the feeling should be, in our hearts, I think, that having demonstrated we could produce synthetic rubber, it is the best assurance we will never again be caught with our pants down when another world war comes. We will have an industry in this country that can produce rubber for every exigency. I now call upon the Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] to make a statement of his point of view on proposed legislation.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Virginia. Mr. President, the measure we have before us is substantially the one that was passed unanimously by the House. The amendments that have been read and adopted effectuate, we believe, more fully the purposes of the House joint resolution.

As explained by the distinguished Senator from Ohio, there are two objectives in this measure. One deals with the public purchase of natural rubber; the other deals with a stand-by plant for the production of synthetic rubber as an essential security program. There was a difference of opinion in the subcommittee on the subject of Government purchase. There was no difference in the subcommittee or in the full committee on the other phases of the measure, and in its final form it was adopted by a unanimous vote in our committee.

We agreed with the House decision, and with the testimony of all Government witnesses, that if there should be a loss on stock-piling, natural rubber has more ample supplies to get into the market, and the Federal Government and the taxpayers should not assume the burden. We also agreed with them that the purchasers of natural rubber who had for 5 years been denied the conduct of their business should be permitted again to do what all other governments now permit, that is, to engage in the private purchase of rubber.

We also agreed that if the supply of natural and synthetic rubber exceeded the world's demand, our Government should not be placed in the position of being the one to bid down the price of rubber, which is the principal source of revenue in Malaya and the Dutch East Indies. And we also thought that we engaged in Government trading as a war emergency which should not be continued any longer than was absolutely necessary. For those reasons, Mr. President, we agreed with the Government witnesses and with the House that the purchase of natural rubber should not be continued by the Government after the last of this month. But from the other standpoint we looked at the situation which confronted us after Pearl Harbor. We had been using from 700,000 to 750,000 tons of rubber a year, and when the Japanese struck and cut off our supply of natural rubber we had only 500,000 tons in this country and only 100,000 more on the water moving to us.

Mr. Baruch in his famous report on strategic war materials said:

> Of all materials, rubber is the most strategic, and without rubber we cannot win the war.

So, following that report we set up synthetic plants, and their production was one of the important elements of a successful war. In 1942 they produced only 22,000 tons, but in 1944 the production of synthetic rubber had been stepped up to 774,000 tons.

Napoleon said that an army travels on its stomach, but a mechanized army in the twentieth century travels on rubber, and we produced the rubber, and we won the war. But we do not want to be absolutely dependent in some future emergency upon supplies that may be 12,000 or 15,000 miles away.

We have now a domestic capacity of synthetic rubber of 1,000,000 tons. It is estimated that the world will produce this year of natural rubber 1,200,000 tons. Of that amount 680,000 tons will be available to us. Our current production of synthetic rubber is 600,000 tons. So this bill provides for a temporary continuance of the regulation which requires every consumer of rubber to use a certain percentage of synthetic rubber until we can work out a more permanent plan to safeguard the future production of synthetic rubber in this country.

I think the Members of this body will find if they examine the testimony that this program is to the best interest of our country and that we should concur in the action already taken by the House in passing the bill.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ROBERTSON of Virginia. I am glad to yield.

Mr. LANGER. I notice the provision in line 15 on page 5, as follows:

> There shall not be declared as surplus nor shall War Assets Administration dispose of any synthetic-rubber plant and facilities costing the Government in excess of $5,000,000.

How many of these plants cost less than $5,000,000?

Mr. ROBERTSON of Virginia. I regret that I do not know the details and cannot supply them to the Senator. Some of the plants did cost less than $5,000,000, but I do not know the exact figures. Perhaps the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER], who was the chairman of our subcommittee, recalls the figures. The testimony before us was very voluminous, but we did not go into particular details respecting the number or the cost of these synthetic plants, because we felt that would be taken care of by the permanent legislation which was to follow the pending measure. The pending legislation is merely to require that the purchase of raw rubber shall cease at the end of this month, but to continue the control program respecting the percentage of raw and synthetic rubber until permanent legislation is enacted.

Mr. BRICKER rose.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Virginia. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BRICKER. As to the sale of the plants there was a top limit of $5,000,000 placed on plants that might be sold under the temporary legislation, except for certain plants which are specified in the proposed amendment.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERTSON of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. Does the Senator know whether all the plants involved cost less than $5,000,000?

Mr. BRICKER. I do not have the exact figure.

Mr. LANGER. Can the Senator tell me what the Omaha plant cost?

Mr. BRICKER. No; I do not have that figure.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I do not want to object to the passage of the bill at this time, but I should like to have some information on that subject if it can be obtained.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Virginia. We shall be very happy to give it to the Senator if we can obtain it. We went quite fully into the question of what was best for the Government, and followed the advice of the Government agencies and they were all unanimous in their recommendation to us.

Mr. LANGER. Could the Senator tell me how many plants there are altogether?

Mr. ROBERTSON of Virginia. That was testified to, but I cannot give the Senator an exact statement. I did not charge my memory with it. I could not say without looking up the record how many plants there are altogether. But I can assure my distinguished colleague that there is no plan on the part of the Government to dispose of any plant the sale of which might result in hazarding the future of our necessary supply of synthetic rubber.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. ROBERTSON of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. I should like to know, for example, where the plants in the West which are going to be closed are located, and where the plants in the East are located which are to be permitted to operate.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Virginia. All I can say to the Senator is that the testimony before us was that if we attempted to make rubber from alcohol it would be seven times as expensive as to make rubber from oil. If the Government were given the corn free gratis, rubber made from corn could not compete, in the matter of operating costs, with butadiene made from petroleum. If that is what the Senator has in mind, I will say that that was the testimony before us. Synthetic rubber made from corn, even at the price at which it sold before the speculators got into the grain market, could not be made competitively with butadiene made from petroleum.

Mr. BRICKER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERTSON of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. BRICKER. One out of the 10 petroleum plants is authorized for sale under this bill, and 2 out of 3 of the alcohol plants.

Mr. LANGER. Can the Senator tell me where those two plants are located?

Mr. BRICKER. Both are located in the East, I believe.

Mr. LANGER. In the East?

Mr. BRICKER. Yes. I do not have the record with me to show their location.

Mr. LANGER. Can the Senator tell me about the one in Omaha, Nebr.? Was that included?

Mr. BRICKER. I am not sure whether it was included or not, but I think it was not.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERTSON of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I should like to ask a question about the proviso in the amendment on page 5, which apparently exempts the butadiene plant located at Toledo, Ohio, from the prohibition against disposal. As I understand the amendment it is a general prohibition against the disposal by the War Assets Administration of any synthetic rubber plant costing the Government in excess of $5,000,000 until the effective date of the permanent legislation. But the proviso exempts from that prohibition a plant at Toledo, Ohio. Can any Senator explain why that exception was granted and what the cost of the Toledo plant was?

Mr. BRICKER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERTSON of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. BRICKER. The Toledo plant is especially adaptable to the chemical industry, and on that account it was specifically exempted. It seems there is a ready market for it at the present time. The RFC felt that there is a ready market for these other synthetic plants that are not being utilized at this time.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Does the Senator know what chemical industry was to acquire the plant?

Mr. BRICKER. No. The testimony before us was that it was available quickly for some chemical industry.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Does the Senator know whether any offer has been made for that plant, and, if so, what?

Mr. BRICKER. There have been negotiations by the RFC, but I do not know whether there is any specific offer, nor do I know the figure which may be involved.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Virginia. The evidence before the committee was that the production of that plant was relatively small, as compared with total production and use in the manufacture of tires and items of that kind. I think it is a plant which makes styrene rubber, which goes into the manufacture of certain plastics. I do not know the use of it, but it is a relatively small thing. The Government wanted to get rid of the plant. There is a commercial plant ready to take it over and save the Government a large loss.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERTSON of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It is easy to use the words "relatively small," but this is obviously a plant costing more than $5,000,000. That is a large sum of money in anyone's book. It seems to me that since a special exemption is proposed to be granted by an amendment of the committee, we ought to have specific information with respect to why that $5,000,000 exemption is granted.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Virginia. Since the plant is in the State of Ohio and not in Virginia, I can say with better grace, perhaps, than can the distinguished Senator from Ohio, that he had nothing to do with the amendment. This was a Government program.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls attention to the fact that the Senate is operating under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, since we are operating under the 5-minute rule, may I make the parliamentary inquiry as to how much time has passed?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Apparently the clock has stopped. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRICKER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Virginia will yield, I should like to make one further suggestion.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Virginia has expired.

Mr. BRICKER. Then I shall speak in my own time.

Mr. President, the plant at Toledo is a butadiene petroleum plant which has never been used to any great extent as compared with the other plants. It is not a styrene or neoprene plant. It is one of the original plants built for the purpose of making petroleum butadiene, and is no longer needed by the Government. There may be market for it now. It was originally built of old materials, we were advised, and may not now sell as a unit. If not, then RFC wants authority to sell all marketable parts. The RFC is certain the Toledo plant will never feature in the Government's permanent synthetic rubber program.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRICKER. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It is my understanding that no member of the committee suggested this exemption, but the exemption is here, and I suggest that it would be advisable if we could have some testimony with respect to the reasons why it was proposed. Since it was not offered by any member of the committee, I assume it must have been offered by the War Assets Administration.

Mr. BRICKER. The suggestion came from the RFC.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Therefore, there is probably in the record some reason for the special exemption of the single plant.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Virginia. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRICKER. I yield.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Virginia. It was also concurred in by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which has been financing the construction and operation of these Government plants. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation was very anxious to have permission to liquidate this investment while it had an opportunity to do so, rather than wait 2 or 3 years, when building materials become available, and this particular company could go into the market and obtain the materials and labor with which to build a plant better suited for its use than this plant would be. In the meantime, it is willing to pay good money for this particular plant, because it can use it now.

Mr. BRICKER. I may say further that the plant has never been very practical or useful in a complete petroleum butadiene production program.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I wish to make a brief statement as to the manner in which this question is presented. Apparently Members of the Senate speaking for the committee have been able to convey to us the conclusions which were reached by the War Assets Administration and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation; but we have no specific information as to what particular company or companies are offering to buy this plant, why they are offering to buy it, and the particular purpose to which it will be put if it is sold.

I take it from what the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER] has said that it is not intended to use the Toledo plant for the purpose of manufacturing synthetic rubber. But the Senator is merely under the impression that some chemical company is interested. The chemical industry in the United States is a pretty thoroughly concentrated industry, and it seems to me that the Senate is entitled to a specific statement of the exact reasons why this exemption is proposed, and the names of all the companies which are involved, the offers which they are making, and information as to when the plant can be sold. I have no doubt that such an explanation can be very readily made, but it has not been made as yet so far as the report of the committee is concerned, or so far as any statement that has been made on the floor is concerned.

Mr. President, if no member of the committee is ready to offer such information, I feel that the joint resolution ought to go over until the information is available.

Mr. BRICKER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I did not think anyone would be interested in the details with respect to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. We accepted their statement to the effect that there is a market at the present time, that the plant is not needed at present, and has not been considered useful or serviceable in the petroleum-butadiene program, and that they would like to get as much for it as they could, the market being better now than it will be at any time in the future.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. BRICKER. If the Senator wishes us to go into each of the individual deals, I will say that that has not been done. We took the recommendations of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and accepted their figures as to the cost value of the various plants, and upon that testimony we made our recommendation. But we did not go into detail as to the offers which were made or the purchasers who might be available.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The $5,000,000 limitation prohibiting the disposal of plants in excess of that cost value without a report to Congress was written into the original surplus-property law for the specific purpose of preventing the sale of very valuable Government plants to concentrated groups. The surplus-property law not only required that a report be made to Congress before any plant in certain categories costing more than $5,000,000 should be disposed of; but also that there should be a report from the Attorney General. So obviously when I see a recommendation from the Committee on Banking and Currency for a specific exemption of a certain plant costing more than $5,000,000, I feel that a clear record ought to be made. Unless such a record can be made within the time limit, I shall be forced to ask that the joint resolution go over.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Inasmuch as the distinguished Senator from Wyoming has stated that the record must be made or he will object, I suggest that we complete the call of the calendar under the 5-minute rule, and then that a motion be made to proceed to consider the joint resolution. By that time no doubt the information which is necessary can be obtained, and there will be opportunity for further debate.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Virginia. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Virginia. I should like to offer a suggestion. As a member of the subcommittee, realizing how absolutely necessary it is to get prompt action, so far as I am personally concerned I would prefer to see this particular amendment dropped from the joint resolution and the joint resolution passed as the House passed it, with certain minor changes.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, when this measure shall have been disposed of the call of the calendar will be completed. At the completion of the call of the calendar I shall move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 736, calendar No. 46, with respect to which the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. MCGRATH] withdrew his motion. As soon as that bill is disposed of, I shall move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House Joint Resolution 118. I hope that in the meantime Senators who are interested may get together so that the joint resolution can be passed at that time. That will allow a little time to see if the amendment can be agreed to or eliminated.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I recognize the great importance of passing this proposed legislation. I believe that the synthetic rubber industry, which was built up in this country during the war, was a magnificent example of what the energy, industry, and skill of the people of America can do. I think it would be a great tragedy if the synthetic rubber industry should be lost. So I am heartily in favor of the passage of the joint resolution. But I feel that the Senate is entitled to an explanation in connection with the point which I raised. I think the suggestion of the senior Senator from Ohio is quite satisfactory.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is heard, and the joint resolution will be passed over.

That concludes the calendar.

DAYLIGHT-SAVING TIME IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 46, Senate bill 736.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 736) authorizing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to establish daylight saving time in the District of Columbia during 1947.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT].

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President——

Mr. TAFT. Mr, President, my motion is not debatable under rule VIII, the hour of 2 o'clock not having arrived.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. OVERTON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of a quorum has been suggested. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hawkes	O'Conor
Baldwin	Hayden	O'Daniel
Ball	Hickenlooper	O'Mahoney
Barkley	Hill	Overton
Brewster	Hoey	Pepper
Bricker	Holland	Reed
Bridges	Ives	Revercomb
Buck	Johnson, Colo.	Robertson, Va.
Bushfield	Johnston, S.C.	Russell
Butler	Kilgore	Saltonstall
Byrd	Knowland	Smith
Cain	Langer	Sparkman
Capehart	Lodge	Stewart
Capper	McCarran	Taft
Chavez	McCarthy	Taylor
Connally	McClellan	Thomas, Okla.
Donnell	McFarland	Thomas, Utah
Downey	McGrath	Thye
Dworshak	McKellar	Tobey
Eastland	McMahon	Umstead
Ecton	Magnuson	Vandenberg
Ellender	Malone	Watkins
Ferguson	Martin	Wherry
Flanders	Maybank	White
Fulbright	Millikin	Wiley
Green	Moore	Williams
Gurney	Morse	Wilson
Hatch	Murray	Young

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT].

Mr. LANGER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], to proceed to the immediate consideration of Senate bill 736. The motion is made under rule VIII prior to the hour of 2 o'clock, and is not debatable. [Putting the question.]

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 736) authorizing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to establish daylight saving time in the District of Columbia during 1947.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Mexico will state it.

Mr. HATCH. Is the pending question debatable?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes; the bill is debatable without limitation.

Mr. MCGRATH. Mr. President, as the author and sponsor of Senate bill 736, I shall detain the Senate but a very few moments in explaining the bill and urging its passage, for the reason that I believe the bill amply speaks for itself and, more than that, I believe that most Members of the Senate have rather ample and adequate knowledge of what the bill proposes, and probably they have rather strong opinions one way or another regarding the subject.

I introduced this bill on behalf of the people who live in the District of Columbia the year round. Its purpose is to set up the necessary machinery whereby daylight saving time can be established in the District of Columbia from the last Sunday in April 1947 until the last Sunday in September 1947, if the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, after public hearings, come to the determination that it is desirable that the District of Columbia operate under daylight saving time or, as some people refer to it, "fast time."

Mr. President, beginning with the last Sunday in April in excess of 50,000,000 people, living mostly in the large cities of the United States, will be operating under so-called daylight saving time. That is particularly true of the entire eastern seaboard. However, it is not confined to the eastern seaboard, because cities throughout the length and breadth of the United States annually adopt daylight saving time.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McGRATH. I am glad to yield.

Mr. OVERTON. Have a majority of the cities of the United States adopted daylight saving time?

Mr. McGRATH. Does the Senator from Louisiana mean to inquire whether they have adopted it through action of the several State legislatures?

Mr. OVERTON. I should like to know whether it has been adopted in any manner. Is daylight saving time now applicable to the majority of the cities of the United States?

Mr. McGRATH. No; I do not think it is. I made the statement that in excess of 50,000,000 people live under daylight saving time during the summer months. So, if that is a correct statement—and I think it is, the remainder of the people of the United States do not live under daylight saving time.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. McGRATH. I am glad to yield.

Mr. OVERTON. We had daylight saving time during the war. Was it Nationwide, by act of Congress; or was it established by action of the States or local communities?

Mr. McGRATH. I believe it was established by Presidential proclamation issued under the President's war powers, and applied Nation-wide. It also applied, as I believe, the year round.

Mr. OVERTON. I thank the Senator.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. President, as I undertook to point out when the bill was reached on the call of the calendar, perhaps no question of local concern has been more thoroughly debated, discussed, and agitated in the press, on the radio, and in public forums during the period under which it has been up for consideration than has the question of daylight saving time. I can only report to the Senate that every business organization in the District of Columbia, including the Board of Trade, the Junior Board of Trade, and various other business organizations, and almost without exception every community organization which operates in the District of Columbia, has appeared in favor of the passage of this bill. Polls have been taken by the press—notably the poll taken by the Washington Times-Herald. In that poll the result was as follows: 5,327 in favor, 2,323 against.

As I stated in the earlier part of the session, the Committee on the District of Columbia has received more mail on this question than it has with respect to any other matter now pending before it. We have received 4,330 letters or postal cards, of which 3,303 were in favor, and 1,027 were against.

Polls have been taken in some of the Government establishments. For instance, a pool taken among the employeess of the Maritime Commission showed the following results: 1,804 in favor, 507 against. In the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey, 543 were in favor, and 121 were against. In the Patent Office, 956 were in favor, and 399 were against.

Mr. President, not an organization, so to speak, which concerns itself with the civic advancement and welfare of the people of the District of Columbia has failed to come forward in support of this measure. Scarcely anything else could come to us with such unanimity of opinion. Obviously it is the desire of the million people who live in the District of Columbia that the little comfort they can get out of this extra hour of daylight during the summertime, in the sweltering city of Washington, shall be given to them.

Mr. President, I recognize the validity of the argument made by the distinguished Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON]; but I wish to point out to him that for a good many of the hot months and hot weeks while the residents of the District of Columbia are living here, the Congress probably will not be in session and the Members of the Congress will be at home, enjoying whatever advantages we have in our own communities. If they provide us with daylight-saving time, all well and good; if they do not, then we can be happy to live under the conditions we find there. Not so with a million other souls who have to stay in the District of Columbia.

I grant the validity of the argument that, of course, the District of Columbia primarily exists for the benefit of the Federal Government, for the convenience of the Government and of the Congress. But I would remind Senators that the population of this city has been very good to those of us who come from the outside to serve our terms in the Congress. They open their arms to us; they receive us; they do everything they can do to make our stay here pleasant and comfortable. So it seems to me only fair and just that we be good neighbors indeed, and that on an issue of this kind we open our hearts a little and be good neighborly and kindly to them.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me once more?

Mr. McGRATH. I yield.

Mr. OVERTON. Have the neighboring States of Maryland and Virginia taken any action in this regard?

Mr. McGRATH. In the last election the people of Baltimore and Baltimore County voted overwhelmingly to adopt daylight-saving time. So the whole of Baltimore County will be operating on daylight-saving time, beginning the last Sunday in April. The counties immediately adjoining Washington have not taken any action in this regard. We have been told that they will abide by whatever is done by the District of Columbia. In other words, if the Commissioners of the District of Columbia adopt daylight-saving time, I have every reason to believe that the adjoining counties in Maryland and Virginia will accommodate themselves to that situation. They are awaiting action by the District of Columbia.

I would remind the Senator that one of the difficulties in handling this problem as a legislative matter has been that we find ourselves in more or less of a vicious circle. The adjoining counties of Maryland and Virginia cannot decide what to do until they learn what the District of Columbia decides to do. The District has been unwilling to decide what to do until it knows what the other communities are going to do. It is impossible for our committee to find that out. That is why we want the matter passed over to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and let them, in cooperation with Federal Government authorities and the authorities in the surrounding counties, try to work out an equitable and fair plan by which they can operate under so-called fast time.

Mr. OVERTON. Have the county commissioners in Maryland the authority to adopt daylight-saving time? Has the legislature vested such authority in the county commissioners?

Mr. McGRATH. I believe that they perhaps do have the power; but I shall not answer the question positively, because there may be some doubt. Senators may be familiar with the fact that I have previously expressed an opinion to the effect that the authority exists to establish daylight-saving time in American communities under the general health powers which have been conferred. That legal position has been questioned, and I am not pressing it. I would remind Senators, however, that in the great State of Illinois, in the city of Chicago, and the other large cities of that State which operate under daylight time, they do so, not by virtue of any act of the legislature, but merely by the exercise of the powers granted to them to legislate on matters affecting the health and comfort of the people. So there probably is authority vested in the local governing units.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. McGRATH. I yield.

Mr. OVERTON. May I ask the Senator what action has been taken by the State of Virginia or any of the counties adjacent to the District of Columbia in the State of Virginia?

Mr. McGRATH. I am not familiar with the fact that any action has been taken.

Mr. OVERTON. As a matter of fact, they have taken no action, have they? I see, before me, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON] who I think resides in Virginia. He would be in position to advise whether any action has been taken.

Mr. McGRATH. I believe that the authorities—I do not know that they are called county commissioners—have given some indication that they would probably, under a volntary system, operate on the same time on which the District of Columbia operates. It seems to me that this is a question which Congress should pass upon from the point of view of what is good and desirable for the people of the District of Columbia.

Mr. OVERTON. What about the trains which come into Washington and leave Washington? Would they operate on daylight saving time, or regular time?

Mr. McGRATH. Regardless of what we do, some of the trains will operate on regular time and some will operate on daylight time, because those from the areas to the north and west, where daylight saving schedules will be in effect, in the large cities where the trains make up and start, will operate on daylight saving time.

Mr. OVERTON. Does not the Senator think that would bring about a great deal of confusion?

Mr. McGRATH. I am certain it will not. It never has in the past in connection with other cities which have gone on daylight saving time. I noted the remarks of the distinguished Senator when he said we should not be controlled by New York. I think I can agree with him in that statement, but, fortunately or unfortunately, perhaps, as the case may be, important rail movements, much news, and many radio programs do emanate from that great metropolitan center. The stockmarkets of the country operate from there, and of course they will operate on daylight time, for the whole State of New York, practically all the large cities in the State of New York, will be operating on daylight time.

I remind the Senator that, rather than interfering with the reception of his favorite radio programs, the adoption of daylight saving time in the District of Columbia would help him to secure some of the programs, because last summer, when for the first time we were not operating under the so-called Presidential wartime order, many of the finest radio programs were not heard in this District of Columbia because they emanated from cities which were on daylight time and the schedule would not permit them to be heard here.

I, too, like to listen to the radio commentators. One of my favorite commentators is Lowell Thomas. I like to listen to him at a quarter of 7 every night, and living here in the District of Columbia all of last summer I found I could not hear him at all, because I had not gotten away from work at a quarter of 6, when the radio stations here in Washington had to carry Lowell Thomas.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McGRATH. I shall continue to yield to the Senator from Louisiana as long as he desires to ask me questions.

Mr. OVERTON. I wish to observe that I have another favorite besides the radio programs, and that is my milk supply. I am a great advocate of the use of milk. I think it is absolutely necessary in the diet of every family, and I like to have a milk supply in my little apartment in Washington. Of course, the flow of milk from the cows is not governed by any act of the Commissioners or by any act of Congress. Their milk flows periodically at certain times; at least, it used to when I was a boy and I had to milk cows. If we advance the time to an hour earlier, what effect will that have on the supply of milk? How are the milkmen then to get the milk to my door at the right time?

Mr. McGRATH. I can answer the Senator by saying that I am not an authority on milk—I use it once in a while, at the right time—but I am sure there will not be any trouble with the delivery of milk to the Senator's door merely because of the variation of 1 hour in time. No one in Boston goes without milk because of daylight time, and the same statement applies to Springfield, Washington, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and many other cities. No one in the great city of Chicago is going without milk merely because the clocks have been advanced 1 hour. I am sure that special arrangements can be made, if necessary, so that the Senator will receive his milk supply.

Mr. OVERTON. In many of the cities the Senator has mentioned the people prefer beer to milk, but I am sort of old-fashioned, and I like milk. The Senator is a member of the committee which passed on this question, is he not?

Mr. McGRATH. I am a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and the sponsor of the bill.

Mr. OVERTON. What inquiry did the Senator make as to the effect daylight-saving time would have on the delivery of milk in the District of Columbia?

Mr. McGRATH. I do not recall testimony on that subject before our committee. I might say to the Senator that that is one of the problems we expect the Commissioners to look into. We are merely proposing to confer upon the Commissioners the authority to take up such questions as that the Senator is now raising, and determine whether the inconvenience, so to speak, would outweigh the convenience which would be enjoyed by the people of the District of Columbia by the establishment of daylight saving time. We did not feel that our committee had the time, or that it was the proper forum to go into all these small details, so to speak, when the Commissioners could more amply do it.

Mr. OVERTON. Speaking of what the Commissioners are going to do—and the Senator is in better position to advise me whether my information is correct or not—I have understood that Commissioner Young took the position that the Commissioners should not do anything until Virginia and Maryland acted.

Mr. McGRATH. I cannot speak at all for the Commissioners.

Mr. OVERTON. Did Commissioner Young appear before the Senator's committee?

Mr. McGRATH. Commissioner Young appeared before our committee, when we had under consideration a previous bill which I had introduced. He did not oppose the idea of daylight-saving time, but stated that one of the questions which had to be considered, and which should be considered, was what the surrounding counties were going to do. I do not recall his remarks as being a flat statement that he denied he would be in favor of daylight time, but I believe he told our committee that he thought the surrounding counties should be consulted before the final decision was made, and the pending bill gives the Commissioners the right to consult them.

Mr. OVERTON. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Rhode Island yield?

Mr. McGRATH. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. As a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia last year, it appeared to me that daylight saving was extremely desirable for the District. I should like to ask the Senator to answer one question, if he has not already answered it. Is it not true generally that businessmen and storekeepers in the District of Columbia are at a disadvantage because the cities they have to deal with in the East, like Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, Boston, and other cities, up and down the coast, are all on daylight time, so that they lose the last hour of their business day, because the men in other cities with whom they have to deal have closed their offices and places of business, and, perhaps, left town.

Mr. McGRATH. The Senator is exactly correct, and that is another reason why the business interests of this community, speaking through their Chamber of Commerce and Board of Trade and other business organizations, have unanimously approved this bill and have pleaded with us, through newspapers and over the radio, and in every way they could possibly make their voices heard, to pass this proposed legislation.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Is it not also true, if the Senator from Rhode Island knows, that the milk which the Senator from Louisiana gets in the morning delivery, is not milk of that morning, in any event, but is milk of the afternoon before, or some previous time?

Mr. McGRATH. I may say the Senator has never invited me over to his house for breakfast, so I do not know how old the milk is that is put on his breakfast table.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. President, I have to attend a committee hearing now, and I wish only to make a short statement in support of the pending bill which was introduced by the distinguished junior Senator from Rhode Island. In passing, I want to say that the subcommittee unanimously approved the bill, and so did the full committee. In fact I do not see why anyone should be against it, unless he is opposed to home rule rights. That is practically all the bill does: it gives authority to the Commissioners of the District to hold hearings and decide whether or not they think the people of the District want daylight saving.

As the Senator from Rhode Island has said, the committee has received thousands of letters, a large percentage of which favor the passage of this measure. I am given to understand that whether the bill passes or not, and whether Washington has daylight saving time or not, some of the services such as the AP and UP and the INS are going to adopt "fast" time; also, the radio stations of the city and some of the stores. I want to quote a few figures from the Times-Herald, which made a survey of this question by publishing a ticket which they asked the readers to mark and send back, as to whether they were in favor of or opposed to daylight saving.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield.

Mr. OVERTON. Is it a fact that the Federation of Women's Clubs in the District of Columbia are opposing this bill?

Mr. BUCK. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. OVERTON. That is testimony that has been called to my attention.

Mr. BUCK. I do not recall that.

Mr. OVERTON. Mrs. Wright, the president of the association, which consists of some 26 different clubs, declared that the Federation of Women's Clubs of the District of Columbia are very much opposed to the bill.

Mr. BUCK. The Senator may be correct. I do not recall the facts.

Mr. OVERTON. While the Senator is on his feet, my attention has also been called to a report of the Commissioners on the pending bill, or on a similar bill.

Mr. McGRATH. If I may interrupt the Senator, I think the Senator from Louisiana was incorrect when he says the Federation of Women's Clubs have opposed this bill. They appeared in opposition to a mandatory bill, but the leaders of that organization in the District Committee room explicitly told me and, I believe the Senator from Delaware was there at the time, that they were not opposed to the pending bill, which I regard as a home-rule bill, and that as to any view that they have to express on this issue, they will be very happy to have an opportunity to express it before the Commissioners.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island has the floor.

Mr. McGRATH. I shall yield to the Senator from Louisiana. However, I should like to point out to him that the transcript from which he is reading is not a transcript that has anything to do with the bill which is now before the Senate. It is a transcript of a hearing which was held on a previous bill introduced by me, which provided that the Congress itself should adopt daylight-saving time for the District. That question is not now before us at all. A great many of the people who testified against that approach to this problem have come to us and have said they are in favor of this approach to it.

Mr. OVERTON. That is exactly the point.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Chair may interrupt, as the Chair understands the parliamentary situation, the Senator from Rhode Island had the floor. He yielded to the Senator from Delaware to make a statement. During the course of the statement by the Senator from Delaware, the Senator from Louisiana propounded a question. The Chair thinks that technically the Senator from Delaware still is in the process of answering the question asked by the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. McGRATH. I recognize my previous yielding, and under that, the Senator from Delaware has the floor.

Mr. BUCK. I thank the Senator.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, may I address a parliamentary inquiry to the Chair?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. OVERTON. Are there any printed hearings, or typewritten hearings, or any hearings reduced to writing whatsoever in respect to a daylight-saving bill for the District of Columbia except the hearings before the Subcommittee on Home Rule and Reorganization of the Committee on the District of Columbia, of date February 18, 1947?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair cannot answer that as a parliamentary inquiry, but he will refer the question to the Senator who is handling the bill on the floor.

Mr. McGRATH. There is no printed record of hearings in connection with the pending bill. The hearings which were had were in connection with the previous bill, and that is the record which the Senator has on his desk.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. President, I do not know whether it is clear to the distinguished Senator from Louisiana that this bill does not provide daylight-saving time for the District of Columbia, but simply authorizes the Commissioners of the District to hold hearings and to decide for themselves whether the District shall have daylight-saving time. In other words, it is the first chance the people of the District have had to enjoy any form of home rule, and I do not see why they should be denied the opportunity thus afforded. I wonder if the distinguished Senator from Louisiana understands that the bill does not provide that there shall be daylight-saving time for the District? It merely authorizes the Commissioners to hold hearings, and, after adequate hearings, to decide whether or not the people of the District want daylight saving.

Mr. OVERTON. That is my understanding, that the author of the bill wishes to delegate authority to the Commissioners, rather than to have Congress act directly on the question.

Mr. BUCK. I thought the Senator might possibly have misunderstood the purport of the bill.

Mr. OVERTON. As I understand, the Senator is opposed to Congress passing on the question. He wants the Commissioners to determine it.

Mr. BUCK. That is right. If the Senator from Rhode Island will permit me, I shall conclude with these few words: In the poll that was taken by the Times-Herald, there were 6,454 replies, of which 4,461 were in favor, 1,993 were opposed. There is also a long letter from the Washington Board of Trade, strongly favoring the measure, as well as from a great many others who have written to the committee and to individual members of the committee.

As I say, so far as I know, the bill represents the first attempt to give people of the District any form of home rule. Personally, I think they ought to have it, and in this instance I hope that the bill will be passed. I thank the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McGRATH. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I wonder if it would not clarify the question raised by the distinguished senior Senator from Louisiana if I were to make this comment: The Senator from Louisiana is correct in saying that at the time of the hearing on the original bill the Federation of Women's Clubs, through proper representatives, appeared as being against that bill. At the hearing on a later measure to provide machinery for the working out of home-rule government for the District of Columbia, the Federation of Women's Clubs appeared, not only not in opposition, but the president of that Federation agreed to serve as one member of the commission in the effort to work out home rule. It is my understanding that with reference to the pending measure the Federation of Women's Clubs regarded it as simply an approach to the home-rule proposition, on which they were generally on record as favoring home rule. It was my understanding that they are not at all opposed to the pending measure.

Mr. McGRATH. That is my understanding also, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McGRATH. I yield.

Mr. OVERTON. Is there any record of those hearings?

Mr. HOLLAND. I believe not, I will say to the Senator. The hearings at which the president of the Federation appeared were hearings conducted by the subcommittee in the effort to establish a commission to work out a home-rule charter, and we did not want to ask anyone to serve as a member of that commission unless he or she was in sympathy with its objectives. The president of the Federation did appear stating that she and her organization were in sympathy with the proposal, and she did accept membership upon that commission. It was also my understanding that she and her organization approved this particular measure as the beginning of that approach to home-rule government.

Mr. McGRATH. The statement of the Senator from Florida I believe correctly states the position of these distinguished organizations which appeared before our committee. Again I reiterate that it is my firm belief, and I think I am stating it as openly and frankly to the Senate as I can, that all these organizations are in favor of the bill in its present form.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question or two?

Mr. McGRATH. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. STEWART. Perhaps the Senator has answered at least a portion of the question or questions I wanted to propound. I was not present during the entire discussion. I am interested in knowing what would result if daylight saving should be adopted by the District, that is, from the standpoint of confusion here on Capitol Hill. We hold our committee meetings at 10 o'clock or 10:30 in the morning, and on the days when the Senate is in session the Senate meets at noon. Would the daylight saving interfere in anywise with such meetings?

Mr. McGRATH. If the Commissioners were to put daylight-saving time into effect, daylight-saving time would become, during the time it was in effect, the standard time for the District, and, of course, Congress would operate under it. However, there is nothing to prevent the Congress in such event from setting its own time schedule, as we set our time schedule now. We are the ones who decide to meet at 12 o'clock or 11 o'clock; we are the ones who decide when to have night sessions; we are the ones who decide when committee meetings are to be held. If we do not want to go along with the time set, the so-called fast time, we can set another time to suit our own convenience.

Mr. STEWART. But daylight-saving time would be in effect here on Capitol Hill unless we decided otherwise?

Mr. McGRATH. Unless Congress decided by adopting a rule to meet at another hour.

Mr. STEWART. That is all I wished to ask.

Mr. McGRATH. It would be known as the standard time for the summer of 1947.

Mr. President, I said at the beginning that I would not detain the Senate very long on this measure. My appeal is on behalf of the citizens of the District of Columbia. I echo the sentiment expressed by the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia when he suggests that this is the first time Congress has been asked to give a measure of home rule to the people of the District. We have heard much about the issue of home rule. Now is the time to show our sincerity. Now is the time, on a very simple little matter, but nonetheless a matter which intimately touches the lives of every man and woman who lives here on which they have expressed themselves so overwhelmingly through every medium they have by which they can express themselves, to show our sincerity and our desire to give to the people of the District this small measure of home rule.

Mr. President, I shall not go into all the advantages which from the standpoint of health and to safety would be derived from daylight saving nor shall I discuss other considerations which would recommend it. Those are arguments to be used before the Commissioners. They are arguments with which I am sure every Senator is amply familiar. In voting upon this issue Senators should not and need not feel that they are putting their own personal stamp upon daylight saving. I say that because I know there are some Senators on the floor who probably do not want to pass upon this issue, but I am asking them to pass upon the pending bill solely as a measure of home rule for the people of the District of Columbia.

I yield the floor.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, I should like to make a very short statement in support of the Senator from Rhode Island and in support of the statement made by the Senator from Delaware, who voiced, I think, the convictions of a majority of the members of the Committee on the District of Columbia. If this enabling legislation is passed, none of us has any idea obviously as to what the Commissioners will do with the issue of daylight saving. But what seems very apparent to me is that in this particular problem, all things considered, the issue is not one with which the Senate of the United States should be concerned. I think it is an issue which must be argued out and discussed and fought over by the residents of the community which the daylight saving is going to affect, either adversely or in a positive and favorable way. It seems to me that as we reflect upon the subject of daylight saving with reference to Washington, D. C., we should consider Washington, D. C., to be an average American community, and not the Nation's Capital. We should leave it up to the people who are to live under daylight saving as to whether they shall accept it or whether they shall reject it.

I happen to live in a State some 3,000 miles away. That is my home. Like other Senators who have come from varying distances, I have come to the Nation's Capital as a guest of this city. We have come to a place in which we are to work, but not to live, and from that standpoint, which is basic and positive with me, I think the problem rests more certainly and conclusively with the Commissioners than it does with us.

The general subject of home rule is of imperative importance to every man in this Chamber. Many of America's problems, I think, would be made easier to solve if there were a fuller assumption of responsibility for personal conduct in all communities throughout this Nation. Therefore when as an individual Senator I have an opportunity to vote in favor of a piece of legislation which will permit the people affected to determine their own destiny, I shall readily and enthusiastically embrace such an opportunity.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CAIN. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. As I understand, there is a difference of 3 hours in time between Tacoma, where the Senator lives, and Washington, D. C.

Mr. CAIN. That is correct, presently.

Mr. LANGER. And there is a difference of 2 hours time between Washington, D. C., and sections of North Dakota. I have received more letters respecting this question of change of time than on almost any other subject involving the District of Columbia. The farmers in North Dakota are overwhelmingly opposed to the proposed change in time. The farmers in my State, especially in the western part of the State, are opposed to such a change. They feel they have a right to hear what is going on as it comes to them over the radio from the city of Washington.

The Senator from Washington said that we Senators are guests of the people of the District. I do not view it in that way at all. Under the Constitution the Congress shall meet in the Capital, and this has been made the seat of government. I think the people all over the Nation, especially the farmers who produce our food, are entitled, as the distinguished senior Senator from Louisiana said a little while ago, to rely on what he called nature taking its course.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, the Senator and I merely have an understandable difference of opinion. In order that I may indicate more clearly what I am thinking about, may I ask the Senator how many citizens there are in his State?

Mr. LANGER. Six hundred and forty thousand.

Mr. CAIN. Six hundred and forty thousand citizens, who obviously are entitled to an expression of opinion on many subjects. But are we not concerning ourselves with a problem within a district which in itself has almost half again as many people as there are in the Senator's State?

Mr. LANGER. I want the distinguished Senator to remember that the citizens of the State of North Dakota are persons of exceptional quality.

Mr. CAIN. With that statement I agree.

Mr. LANGER. Not only that but the overwhelming number of them are farmers. They want to get the market prices. They want to know what is going on in the Nation's Capital. I ask the Senator further to remember that in many towns there is an extra hour difference because of what is called fast time, making a difference of 2 hours.

When it is 12 o'clock noon in Washington it is 9 o'clock in Tacoma, in the Senator's State. If there is a difference of an additional hour, the farmer will have to get up at 8 o'clock. If so-called fast time is introduced, he will have to get up at 7 o'clock to hear a program at 9. In order to hear a program on the radio at 9 o'clock in the morning Washington, D. C., time he will have to get up 4, or possibly 5, hours earlier.

I can understand the Senator's viewpoint with respect to home rule. However, the people of my State firmly believe that, so far as the Nation's Capital is concerned, they are interested, and they want to know what is going on. They want to be well informed.

Mr. CAIN. The Nation's Capital is very much interested in what is going on within the Senator's State. But in a matter of this character the Nation's Capital would hesitate to tell the Senator's State when to get up and when to go to bed.

Mr. LANGER. But if a person wishes to listen to the radio in North Dakota, he will be compelled to get up an hour earlier.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAIN. I yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. I should like to read a letter. I have been quite concerned about daylight-saving time. I think we should consider the question of whether or not to regulate the radio on God's time rather than on daylight-saving time.

I am very much impressed by what my friend from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] has said. Several months ago I took it upon myself to make an investigation, and a few weeks ago I wrote to Mr. Charles R. Denny, Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission, to see how the entire United States is being upset by the domination of the radio interests of New York to the disadvantage of the farmers. With the permission of the Senator I should like to read the letter which I received from Mr. Denny:

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., March 19, 1947.

Hon. BURNET R. MAYBANK,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR MAYBANK: I now have the data with which to answer your letter of March 10, 1947, concerning networks and stations operating in daylight-saving-time areas.

The 4 Nation-wide networks had a total of 749 affiliated stations in July 1946. Of these, 194, or 25.9 percent were located in cities and communities which observed daylight-saving time in 1946. Each of the national networks had some outlets in daylight-saving-time areas.

A total of 965 stations were operating in July 1946. Of these, 270, or 26 percent, were located in cities and communities which observed daylight-saving time in 1946, while 695, or 72 percent, were in communities which did not observe daylight-saving time.

With respect to your question concerning the percentage of the country which observed daylight-saving time, the latest year for which a study has been made is 1941. In that year, a compilation by the National Association of Broadcasters indicates that approximately 35,000,000 people, or 25 percent of the population, resided in cities and communities which observed daylight-saving time. These 35,000,000 people represented approximately 28 percent of the total radio families in the United States.

You may be interested to learn that a pamphlet which lists the cities and communities observing daylight-saving time is published annually by the Commerce and Industry Association, of 233 Broadway, New York City. They have informed us by phone that they did not know of any population study of daylight-saving-time areas for 1946 similar to the one referred to above for 1941. Further, they knew of no map which has been prepared which set forth the daylight-saving-time areas of the country.

I sincerely hope that the above information is adequate for your needs. In the event that any further information is desired, please do not hesitate to let me know.

Very truly yours,
CHARLES R. DENNY,
Chairman.

I asked for a map, so that everyone could see where the 25 percent of the people live who benefit from daylight-saving time, while farmers in the Dakotas and the Carolinas and elsewhere suffer.

The letter from Mr. Denny shows that 28 percent of the people are the only beneficiaries, while others—especially the farmers—suffer from a lack of marketing news, including a knowledge of the price of wheat, cotton, or corn. They suffer because of lack of information as to the hog and cattle markets at Chicago. They suffer all these disadvantages because of New York.

Mr. CAIN. In connection with this problem, Mr. President, we are concerning ourselves with the right of determination of 1,000,000 people as to whether or not they want to get up an hour earlier.

Mr. MAYBANK. I believe that the million people in the Washington area are very fortunate to have the Congress here. Most of them would not be here if it were not for Congress. They are 90 percent dependent on the Government for their living.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, I merely wish to reemphasize what some of us feel. Through this piece of legislation we are determining a fundamental issue revolving around the desirability of home rule for a geographical area in which approximately 1,000,000 people live. They consider themselves, in the aggregate, to be an American community deserving of the right to determine whether or not they shall have daylight saving. We want only to provide a right for Washington, D. C., which other communities take, as they should, for granted.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, I hope that I shall not be regarded as in any way hostile to the District of Columbia because I oppose the enactment of the pending legislation. There was a time when I was represented as being one of the best friends of the District of Columbia in the United States Senate. I have always espoused the cause of the citizens of the District of Columbia when I thought they were right. I shall not hesitate to oppose them when I think they are wrong.

This question is not one which concerns only the people of the District of Columbia. As the able Senator from North Dakota has said, it is far-reaching. It extends even to the domain of his own State. It reaches out into the State which is so ably represented by the present occupant of the chair [Mr. KNOWLAND]. It reaches down into Louisiana.

The seat of government of the United States is in the District of Columbia. Here the business of the Nation is transacted, not only by Congress, but by the various executive departments. I undertake to close my office, as the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK] very well put it, according to God's time. I close my office at 5 o'clock in the afternoon. That is 4 o'clock in Louisiana. A great many of my constituents, not realizing the difference in time, call up my office after 4 o'clock only to find no one there. They call various departments of the Government with respect to subjects in which they are interested, only to find that all of them close at 5 o'clock, which is one hour earlier than the time in Louisiana.

On top of that, it is proposed to add another hour; so that if any of my constituents in Louisiana wish to communicate with the Agriculture Department, the War Department, the Navy Department, the Treasury Department, or any other agency of the Government, they must reach the telephone by 2 o'clock, because it requires about an hour to get the connection made and the message through. So if it is a very important matter which must be determined quickly and promptly, they must act by that time in order to receive information promptly, or else they cannot receive it at all that day, and will have to wait until the next day. That is all right in the opinion of the proponents of the bill. It does not make a particle of difference how much the people of North Dakota are inconvenienced or how much the people of Louisiana are inconvenienced, just so the people of the District of Columbia feel a little bit better because they happen to have an opportunity to get up an hour earlier than God intended them to get up, anyway. They probably want to go to bed an hour earlier. That would be a good thing. My 16 years' residence here in Washington has forced me to the conclusion that a great many of the citizens ought to retire much earlier than they do. [Laughter.] I think their earlier retirement would redound to the health and well-being of the Washingtonians.

Mr. President, when it comes to home rule, I am reminded of the fact that when the District of Columbia was established, hardly anyone resided here. There were a few people in Georgetown and some residents scattered here and there. The District of Columbia was set aside because it was desired to place it completely under the jurisdiction of the Congress of the United States; and the Constitution provides that the Congress of the United States shall exercise sole legislative authority over the District of Columbia.

Here we have a bill which the Senate is considering. When it was first presented, it provided that Congress should pass on the question whether the District of Columbia should have daylight saving time. That did not appear to be satisfactory, as I gather from the argument made by the able Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. MCGRATH] and other Senators. The bill did not appear to be satisfactory to the Committee on the District of Columbia. So that bill was brushed aside and Congress undertook to "pass the buck" to the three Commissioners of the District of Columbia. Then this bill was introduced. Hearings were had on the other bill.

I requested, and received awhile ago, a typewritten copy of some hearings. They were never printed. They were held on February 18, 1947, on a bill the number of which I do not know. It was some other bill; at least, the Senator from Rhode Island tells me it was. It was a bill according to which Congress would exercise its legislative authority over the District of Columbia, and would not undertake to delegate that authority to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

I have my doubts about the constitutionality of this bill. I do not know whether the very able members of the Committee on the District of Columbia have ever considered it from a constitutional standpoint. But it is a delegation of authority without any general circumscribing provisions by which that authority can be exercised. It simply says that Congress will not decide this question; the Commissioners of the District of Columbia will decide it. It does not say under what circumstances the Commissioners will decide it. It does not contain any bounds to their authority. If the Congress of the United States delegates authority, it must do so under certain formulas. It cannot simply give a blanket delegation of authority.

Let me read this bill. It is a very short one:

That, for the purpose of determining whether or not daylight saving time should be established in the District of Columbia during the year 1947, the Commissioners of the District shall conduct open hearings at which the residents of the District may express their views on the establishment of such time.

I want to note en passant that according to the provisions of this bill, the only persons who can appear before the Commissioners are residents of the District of Columbia. If they reside in Arlington, Va., or in Silver Spring, Md., they cannot appear, although they may work in the District of Columbia and make their living there. The only persons who can be heard are those who reside within the immediate confines of the District of Columbia.

But to proceed with my knitting, it is further provided:

SEC. 2. If, as a result of the hearings held pursuant to the first section of this act, the Commissioners should decide that daylight saving time should be established in the District during the year 1947, the Commissioners are authorized to advance the standard time for the District one hour for any period of the year 1947 not earlier than the last Sunday of April of such year and not later than the last Sunday of September of such year. Any such time established by the Commissioners pursuant to this act shall, during the period for which it is applicable, be considered the standard time for the District of Columbia.

There are no exceptions. Congress is not excepted. Committees of Congress are not excepted. Sessions of Congress are not excepted. If the District of Columbia has daylight saving time, the Commissioners cannot say that it does not apply to Congress, that it shall not apply to those who work in departments of the Government, or that it shall not apply to those employed in hotels, restaurants, and so forth. It must be of general application. It must apply to every one in the confines of the District of Columbia. It will be legal time for the District of Columbia.

The bill further provides:

The Commissioners shall forthwith proceed in the exercise of the authority herein contained and shall, as soon as practicable, publish their findings and orders thereunder.

Mr. President, I do not see why the Committee on the District of Columbia does not, if I may use a common expression, take the bull by the horns and pass on this question and determine whether Congress wishes to have daylight saving time within the District of Columbia.

I am sorry the Senator who made the motion is not present—the senior Senator from Ohio, who has absented himself from the Senate Chamber ever since the debate began. Very important legislation is now awaiting action by the Senate; and I wish to say here that the Senate has been running so far behind in its schedule that we are faced with ignoring the streamlined congressional reorganization bill, and we now learn that instead of having sessions 3 days a week, we must have them 5 days a week, and possibly on Saturdays, and some sessions at night.

But notwithstanding all the important business which is waiting for our action and which must be transacted between now and April 1, according to the declaration made by the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] and other leaders of the Republican Party, lo and behold, the senior Senator from Ohio has moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill which affects solely the District of Columbia, even though matters with which the entire Nation is very much concerned are waiting to be acted upon by the Senate.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. OVERTON. I am glad to yield.

Mr. McGRATH. I wish to say that I am sure what the Senator from Ohio did this morning was done as a courtesy to the Senator from Rhode Island. I asked the Senator from Ohio what procedure I should follow and what would be the appropriate time for me to make the motion. I certainly would have made the same motion which he made; and I regard what he did as merely a Senatorial courtesy extended from one Senator to another. I greatly appreciate it, and I do not think any political argument should be made against him because of that observance, on his part, of a spirit of cooperation.

Mr. OVERTON. I am not making a political argument. I am making an argument in the interest of my country. I am making a good Republican argument and a good Democratic argument. I am saying that when legislation of such grave importance confronts the Senate and awaits its action, we should not turn aside to determine whether the Commissioners of the District of Columbia should hold hearings and subsequently should decide whether daylight-saving time should be established in the District of Columbia. It seems to me that that is not exactly the proper thing to do; that is all I have to say about this phase of it. Also, I do not think the people of the Nation would look with favor upon our consuming such valuable time on a mere local bill.

The bill before us could provoke considerable discussion; and as a matter of fact, it should be discussed, because there are a great many angles to it.

Let us consider another question which is involved in this matter. Suppose the Commissioners do adopt daylight-saving time. Then what about the train schedules? I tried to find out about that from the Senator from Rhode Island. He said some of the trains would operate on daylight-saving time and others would not. It seems to me that such a situation would not be conducive to proper regulation. It was all right during the war, when we were bending every effort to win the war, to have a uniform rule and regulation, namely, that throughout the United States, daylight-saving time should be placed in effect. But to have a topsy-turvy situation, whereby Washington has daylight-saving time, and other parts of the Nation do not have it; and whereby the trains of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad operate on daylight saving time, but the trains of the Pennsylvania Railroad operate on standard time; and whereby the radio stations in Mississippi, Louisiana, and California operate on standard time, for the most part, if not altogether, whereas other radio stations operate on daylight-saving time—what a hodge-podge of confusion there will be.

What argument can be brought to bear to sustain legislation of this character, Mr. President? I do not desire to be facetious of course. Although I was not raised on a farm, I was raised in a small town of approximately 200 or 300 souls, and I know something about rural life. Mr. President, it seems to me that we should pursue the course that the God of nature has prescribed for the creation of this earth. Daylight-saving time or no daylight-saving time, the birds are going to their nests according to standard time, and the squirrels will go to their rest in the same way; and the cows will want to go to the barns and get their food at that time; and the horses will want to cease their day's labor and go to rest at that time; and they are entitled to do so. But here come the Members of the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia; and, like Joshua of old, they want to bid the sun and the moon to stand still—why? In order to accommodate some of these ambitious people who like to get to work early and like to get away from work early and get out in the sun and play golf, and, after a few rounds of golf, retire for proper refreshments. [Laughter]. In order that they may indulge in those peculiarities and eccentricities, Mr. President, we are told that we must stop all the machinery of legislation in the Congress of the United States, so as to take up this important question of delegating to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia authority—to do what? To hold hearings. They would have to hold extensive hearings to determine whether the people of the District of Columbia would save an hour of daylight or whether they would go to bed later.

Mr. President, I try to regulate my own office in a way that is fair and just and reasonable to my clerical staff. I do not want any of them to appear there before 9 o'clock in the morning, standard time, and I do not think they should. I do not get there until 10 o'clock; I wait until the mail is arranged in my office before my advent there. I like to have them get away at 5 o'clock in the afternoon, but I do not want them to be leaving there at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, under a time schedule which may be fixed by my good friend Russell Young, whom I like very much—and I am very proud of the fact that I am a graduate of Dean Young's school of expression, and what little ability I may have in being able to address the Senate is largely due to the fact that I am a student, and have been for a number of years, of Dean Young's school of expression. I commend favorable consideration of it to all other Members of the Senate.

I am sure Commissioner Young will give very earnest consideration to this important measure if Congress undertakes to delegate the authority to him. I am very proud of Commissioner Young, and I also like the other Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to permit me to ask a question?

Mr. OVERTON. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. If the Commissioners of the District of Columbia decide to establish daylight-saving time in the District of Columbia, thereby moving the clocks 1 hour ahead, then a citizen residing in California would not be able to get in telephonic or telegraphic communication with any person in the State Department or the Department of Agriculture or the Department of Commerce in Washington after 1 o'clock in the afternoon; would he?

Mr. OVERTON. If he wanted to get into communication with any department on Wednesday he would have to get up at midnight on Tuesday in order to do it. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANGER. That is correct.

Mr. OVERTON. That is what one who lives in California would have to do.

Mr. LANGER. That would be true all over the West.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I should like to say, in connection with what the distinguished Senator stated about Commissioner Young, that I think Washington is very fortunate in having such an able Chairman of the Board of Commissioners and such an excellent man. Any remarks I have made were intended only for the benefit of the people of my State, whom I am here to represent, and were not in any way questioning the integrity, the ability, or the honesty of Commissioner Young, and his desire to see that justice is done.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, my only hope, if the bill shall be passed by the Congress, will rest in the good, sound judgment of Commissioner Young. He is a man of good, practical common sense, a very able Commissioner. I do not think he would put into effect a daylight saving scheme for the District of Columbia alone, when Maryland does not have it and Virginia does not have it, and when over half the people of the United States do not have it. As the Senator from North Dakota has very well pointed out, if, let us say, some constituent of the able Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], who is now occupying the chair, desired to call him up and say, "Now, Senator, I would like to have you vote for such and such a bill," by the time he had gotten him on the telephone the bill would have been passed and signed by the President. [Laughter.] I think the Presiding Officer should stop and think about that.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. OVERTON. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I should like to ask the Senator from Louisiana a question. The only thing that is worrying me is that if daylight saving time is put in force in Washington, D. C., but in the surrounding territory standard time is kept, there will be two times, and how would people arrange their affairs? That is what I want to know.

Mr. OVERTON. We will just be "two-timed"; that is what will happen. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Let us say that the children in a family do not get up to go to school until 9 o'clock standard time, but the father comes into the District to go to work at 9 o'clock daylight saving. The children would have to get up an hour earlier, or probably the family would have to have two breakfasts.

Mr. OVERTON. That is correct. They would have to have two watches, on keeping standard time and one daylight saving time. [Laughter.]

Mr. MAYBANK. Following that up, Mr. President, I should like to know what would happen to railroad accommodations. If one left Washington he would leave on one time, and if a man left Alexandria he would be leaving on another time.

Mr. OVERTON. That is correct.

Mr. MAYBANK. If one lived in the neighborhood of Spring Valley or Forty-ninth Street, he would leave at one time, but a man catching a train in rural Maryland would leave at another time.

Mr. OVERTON. That is correct.

Mr. MAYBANK. So how would any one know how to catch a railroad train?

Mr. OVERTON. I do not know. If one takes a bus to go to Silver Spring, he will meet himself coming back. [Laughter.]

Mr. MAYBANK. That is correct; he would go and come back before he got there. [Laughter.]

Mr. OVERTON. That is correct. I do not wish to detain the Senate much longer on the bill which, with all due respect to the committee, I think would be very bad legislation.

If the President of the United States, exercising such wartime powers as may be left to him—I do not know that he has many left—should undertake to have national daylight-saving time, so that all could rise together and go to bed together, catch a train together and catch busses together, and the young men could call on their lady friends at the right time, I might be in favor of it. That last reference reminds me of another thing that is bad. A boy calls a young lady up and makes an appointment, they have a date for the evening, and fix an hour. She has standard time and he has daylight-saving time, and they do not get together at all. It merely makes for confusion all around, and I certainly hope the Senate will vote the bill down.

If the bill passes—and it probably will—I will be tempted to insert in the Washington newspapers an advertisement in the lost-and-found column reading something like this:

"Lost—somewhere between sunrise and sunset, one golden hour, set with 60 diamond minutes. No reward is offered; it is lost forever."

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hickenlooper	O'Conor
Baldwin	Hill	O'Daniel
Ball	Hoey	O'Mahoney
Brewster	Holland	Overton
Bricker	Ives	Reed
Buck	Johnson, Colo.	Revercomb
Butler	Johnston, S. C.	Robertson, Va
Byrd	Kilgore	Russell
Cain	Knowland	Saltonstall
Capehart	Langer	Sparkman
Chavez	McCarran	Stewart
Donnell	McCarthy	Taft
Downey	McClellan	Thomas, Okla.
Dworshak	McFarland	Thye

Ferguson	Magnuson	Wherry
Flanders	Malone	White
Fulbright	Martin	Wiley
Green	Maybank	Williams
Gurney	Millikin	Wilson
Hatch	Moore	Young
Hawkes	Morse
Hayden	Murray

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The bill is open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be offered, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. OVERTON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WHERRY. I announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. BROOKS] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. KEM] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. JENNER] and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON] are absent because of illness.

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. CORDON] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] are absent by leave of the Senate.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH], and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] are absent by leave of the Senate because of attendance at an important committee meeting.

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BUSHFIELD] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] are unavoidably detained. If present and voting, the Senator from New Hampshire would vote "yea."

Mr. MAYBANK. I announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] are absent on public business.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. TAYLOR] is detained on official business at one of the departments of the Government.

The Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] is in attendance at an important meeting of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] are absent by leave of the Senate because of attendance at an important committee meeting.

The result was announced—yeas 56, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—56

Aiken	Gurney	Martin
Baldwin	Hatch	Millikin

So the bill (S. 736) was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 27) amending the Settlement of Mexican Claims Act of 1942 to provide for the consideration of any claim decided by the General Claims Commission in which the United States filed a petition for rehearing.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to a concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 8) relative to placing temporarily a statue of the late Senator Borah, of Idaho, in the rotunda of the Capitol and the holding of ceremonies in connection therewith.

SYNTHETIC-RUBBER PRODUCTION

Mr. TAFT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House Joint Resolution 118.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be stated by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 118) to strengthen the common defense by maintaining an adequate domestic rubber-producing industry.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee amendments have heretofore been agreed to. The joint resolution is open to further amendment.

Mr. BRICKER. Mr. President, at the conclusion of the discussion of the pending bill a while ago on the floor of the Senate, while the calendar was being called, several questions were asked, the information with respect to which was not available at that time. I have since secured the information, and I think I have satisfied the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] that the Toledo plant is one that ought to be sold at this time. It is a reconverted plant with dilapidated machinery, all of it second-hand in the beginning, and it would cost $1,000,000 to rehabilitate and place in operation.

A question was further asked in regard to the Omaha plant. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER] was interested in that plant. It is now utilized entirely for the manufacture of alcohol; it is operated directly by the Government and is not involved in any way in the proposed authority to sell.

The plants which are in the alcohol group, which the Government has to sell, about which there was some question, are, first, at Kobuta, Pa.; second, at Institute, W. Va.; and, third, at Louisville, Ky. It is the Department's intention, of course, under the law, to advertise for bids and sell them to the ones from whom they secure the best bids, as I understand. That is the authority we have asked in this bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRICKER. I yield.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to have the distinguished Senator from Ohio give me a little further assurance that the Omaha plant is not included. I presume the opinion he has just stated was arrived at by conferring with those who prepared the bill?

Mr. BRICKER. With the RFC.

Mr. BUTLER. In paragraph (d), on page 5, it is provided that—there shall not be declared as surplus nor shall War Assets Administration dispose of any synthetic-rubber plant and facilities.

The Omaha plant would not come under the words "and facilities"?

Mr. BRICKER. It is not intended to be included under those words.

Mr. BUTLER. The only product the Omaha plant has produced is alcohol, industrial and otherwise, and sirup.

Mr. BRICKER. Some might still be sold for the purpose of making rubber, but the plant has not been engaged in that line of work.

Mr. BUTLER. So we can be quite certain that the Omaha plant is not affected in any way?

Mr. BRICKER. I am sure of that.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRICKER. I yield.

Mr. WILSON. What about the Muscatine plant?

Mr. BRICKER. There is no Muscatine plant included in the request for authority to sell.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, this measure went over earlier in the day because of a question which I raised. During the consideration of the daylight saving bill I conferred with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BRICKER] and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON]. I called the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. I find that the Toledo plant, which is exempted by the terms of the committee amendment from the prohibition of the sale of plants exceeding a cost of $5,000,000, is a high-cost plant which, according to the report filed by Congress on behalf of the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion by Mr. W. L. Batt, was not designed for retention by the Government. That plant will be cannibalized and sold in different ways. I am quite satisfied from the inquiries I have made and the replies I have received from responsible authorities that there is no objection to the amendment. I am glad to give my support to the amendment and to the joint resolution.

Mr. BRICKER. Mr. President, I have information as to all the plants involved, showing the cost of construction and the present operators. However, it is not necessary to read such information into the RECORD unless there is some further question.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, there was a question not only with reference to the Omaha plant, but other plants. Altogether there are three Government-owned alcohol plants, one at Omaha, one at Kansas City, and one at Muscatine, Iowa. As I understand, the Senator from Ohio is certain that the provisions of the joint resolution in no way affect the disposal of those plants.

Mr. BRICKER. The joint resolution does not affect the alcohol plants at all.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio a question. Does the joint resolution affect the plant at Muscatine?

Mr. BRICKER. No; that is one of the alcohol plants, and it is not affected in any way.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution is before the Senate and open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the joint resolution.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 118) was read the third time and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. WHITE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

The following favorable report of a nomination was submitted:

By Mr. WILEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary:

Borinquen Marrero Rios, of Puerto Rico, to be associate justice of the Supreme Court of Puerto Rico, vice Jorge Louis Cordova Diaz, resigned.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will proceed to state the nominations on the Executive Calendar.

ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION—NOMINATION OF DAVID E. LILIENTHAL

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, under the heading of the Tennessee Valley Authority and the Atomic Energy Commission there are seven names on the Executive Calendar. I think it would facilitate consideration of the controversial nominations if we were to proceed first with the nomination of Mr. Lilienthal, leaving for later disposition the consideration of the other nominations. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the nomination of David E. Lilienthal to be a member of the Atomic Energy Commission.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHITE. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is the nomination of Mr. Clapp to be a member of the Board of Directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority included among the seven nominations mentioned by the Senator?

Mr. WHITE. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. I would rather have that nomination considered separately.

Mr. WHITE. Then I modify my request to the effect that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the nominations under the title "Atomic Energy Commission" and that we first consider the nomination of David E. Lilienthal.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of David E. Lilienthal to be a member of at Atomic Energy Commission?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. As I understand, unanimous consent has been given for the consideration at this time of the nomination of David E. Lilienthal to be a member of the Atomic Energy Commission.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. As I understand, there is no understanding or agreement, or consent given which requires that all the nominations under that heading be voted on at once.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is not.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. It was my understanding the other day that it was the general consensus that while we might discuss the nominations together, the Senate desired to vote on each nomination separately; but I believe that no such agreement has been formally entered into.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will say to the Senator that the discussion can proceed as it normally would, but the determination of the voting can come at a later time.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WHERRY. As I understand, the pending question is the confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Lilienthal.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER obtained the floor.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for the purpose of suggesting the absence of a quorum?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hayden	O'Conor
Baldwin	Hickenlooper	O'Daniel
Ball	Hill	O'Mahoney
Barkley	Hoey	Overton
Brewster	Holland	Reed
Bricker	Ives	Revercomb
Bridges	Johnson, Colo.	Robertson, Va.

Hawkes	Myers

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of David E. Lilienthal to be a member of the Atomic Energy Commission?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, the question of the confirmation of the President's appointments to the Atomic Energy Commission and the General Manager of the Commission is of vital and immediate importance to the American people. The matter has been before the Senate section of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy and before the country for a considerable period of time, and it should be settled without further delay.

The Atomic Energy Act was passed last July, and it was approved by the President on August 1, 1946. The President, on October 28, 1946, appointed David E. Lilienthal as Chairman of the Commission, and Dr. Robert F. Bacher, Lewis L. Strauss, Sumner T. Pike, and William W. Waymack, members. The President thereafter appointed Carroll L. Wilson as General Manager. This Commission took over its duties immediately, and the transition from the military control to civilian control under this Commission began at once, culminating in the assumption of full control and responsibility of atomic energy under the Atomic Energy Act by the Commission on January 1, 1947. This Commission, therefore, has been in practical charge of our entire operations in the atomic energy field since the 1st of November 1946.

It must be recalled, Mr. President, that prior to the appointment of the Commission last fall, the entire atomic energy project from its earliest inception to the successful production of an atomic bomb was a military operation, controlled by the military under war conditions and under all the secrecy and highest degree of security that such conditions demand.

This effort called for the greatest concentration of scientific and industrial ability and resources ever devoted to a single project, and its success is an everlasting monument to the American free-enterprise system and to the ability with which such a system, in time of emergency, brings together the cooperative genius of freemen. The success of this project is also a monument to the organizing and directing ability of Gen. Leslie R. Groves, whose ability and genius coordinated all of the various and conflicting fields of science and industry, resulting in the production of a weapon that ended the war, saved countless thousands of American lives, and laid the basis for the practical application of great new scientific principles which we hope will contribute immeasurably to the peaceful progress and advancement of mankind.

With the surrender of Japan, however, and the lack of any clear peacetime method of handling this new force, without any history or experience for a guide, and with the future mysteries of atomic energy still unsolved, the progress in this field abated somewhat. No legislative program for the control and advancement of the science had yet been prepared; speculation and imagination immediately ran riot; and predictions running all the way from dire and unavoidable doom to the immediate presence of the millennium as the result of this discovery swept not only our country but the world. Because there was no legislative program provided for the immediate transition from war to peace, it was necessary for the military to retain full and complete control, under military terms and conditions, of this going plant that had been built; and it was essential that the military retain such control until a program of peaceful handling had been devised. The Special Committee on Atomic Energy of the Senate went to work on this problem early in the fall of 1945. Various theories of legislation were proposed. The committee was fully aware, not only of the seriousness of the problem, but of the vital necessity for finding the best possible solution within the limits of knowledge and of reasonable prediction. It gave intensive time and attention to the formulation of a peacetime legislative policy and of laws to implement it. The result of these studies was the Atomic Energy Act of 1946, that was signed by the President on August 1, 1946.

Meanwhile, a year of uncertainty had passed; scientists and engineers in varying degrees of ability, experience, and knowledge began to drift away from the project and return to their normal peacetime jobs or studies; no one could be certain just what the final program might be; the military could not satisfactorily operate it as a peacetime activity, or program the future from that standpoint; the civilian commission was not appointed until late October in 1946. The military administration under the Manhattan district did keep the activities connected and intact, but held them more or less in status quo until such time as a peacetime policy could be established and confirmed; but it is only fair to say that the degree or extent of progressive, scientific, and practical advancement during this period has not been as great as it could have been under settled conditions.

Finally, in the first part of November 1946, the newly appointed chairman and members of the Atomic Energy Commission designated by the President began the job of taking over the program of peacetime control under the Atomic Energy Act; and, as said before, their full and complete control was accomplished January 1, 1947. The Manhattan District was thereupon relieved of authority over and direction of the activities, and that Commission is now and has been in control of this most vital American and even world responsibility for over 4 months.

The United States and the world cannot afford to have any further delay in the reliable and vigorous progress of this science, nor can the United States or the world afford to brook further continuance of confusion, uncertainty, and stagnation of the progress we must make or the maintenance of the preeminence in this field that we must maintain for the assurance and, in fact, the guaranty of our system of human freedom and human hope in these uncertain times. No possible excuse will suffice to tomorrow's generation if we, by protracted confusion, unsupported fear, or unfounded suspicion, permit delays in our immediate and utmost progress in atomic energy. Until reliable assurances of peace and good will can be had, it is our major safeguard against barbarism and social and economic destruction.

The Commission that has been appointed may not be satisfactory to every one; it may be that no Commission would be satisfactory to every one. In a field where there is no history of past operation, and where the future is not clearly patterned, no one can define with certainty exactly what kind of Commission would best serve us, or can describe exactly the particular temperament and abilities of the personnel that is required to best serve us. I think, Mr. President, that each of us can only try to appreciate the vital necessity of getting on with this work vigorously, in order to make the best possible progress; and we should form our opinions as to the Commission, based upon the broad individual capacities of its membership, their devotion to the basic philosophies of our system and their fundamental honesty and integrity of purpose.

It must also be borne in mind that the members of this Commission, appointed by the President, hold office, under these appointments, only until a year from next August, or approximately eighteen months from now. This provision was placed in the law by the Senate special committee, and was passed by the Congress, upon the theory that no one could be certain as to just how atomic energy should be handled under a permanent peacetime policy. This provision permits the continued and vigorous development of atomic energy, but gives time during which its operation can be further examined and studied and provides opportunity for any changes or alterations that experience dictates.

The hearings before the Senate section of the Joint Atomic Energy Committee have been protracted and exhaustive; the printed copies of those hearings have been placed upon the desk of each Member of the Senate; most of the inquiry was relevant to the issues at hand, but some of it was immaterial and burdensome. Mr. President, I may say, however, that every substantial suggestion touching upon the qualifications of these appointees that came to the attention of the committee was investigated; every witness requested was summoned; the committee made inquiries of its own; upon the whole record the committee came to the conclusion that the commission appointees and the General Manager should be confirmed and the committee so recommends.

It is not my purpose, in this statement, to discuss the details of the hearings in connection with the qualifications of each of the appointees. In the report of the hearings that has been delivered to the Senate, the background and qualification of each man is set out in connection with his appearance before the committee.

However, because much of the testimony in examination before the committee was directed at the qualifications of David E. Lilienthal as Chairman of the Commission, I should like to discuss that phase of the examination briefly.

Suggestions and insinuations were made that Mr. Lilienthal either was friendly to Communist elements and persons or was tolerant of and indifferent to the activities of Communists in connection with his administration of the Tennessee Valley Authority while a member of the Board of Directors and Chairman. Much time was given to this phase of the inquiry, but the most that can be said of the evidence developed after penetrating emotional innuendo, insinuation and suggestion is that the evidence produced before the committee was only a burdensome rehash of the evidence taken in at least two and perhaps three other prior hearings and investigations either by committees of the Congress or by arms of the Government and it developed nothing that had not already been passed upon after examination and inspection by public bodies.

Investigation in 1939 and 1940, conducted in the main by the Dies committee in the House, disclosed that in 1937 or 1938 there were three discovered Communists employed in TVA out of a total number of employees of upward of ten or eleven thousand. I think it is a fair conclusion from the evidence to say also that there were seven or eight persons whose actions, conduct, and statements at that time indicated their sympathy for communism and they might well be called "fellow travelers." The Dies committee went into this matter and held a hearing, on the ground, in the area of the Tennessee Valley Authority. The results of this investigation were reported to the authorities of TVA and two of the admitted Communist Party members were discharged and one was retained.

The evidence with respect to the retention of this one seems clear; that is, his strong affirmation that while he had been a member of the Communist Party as a young man then of but 19 or 20 years of age, he had maintained his delusion for only a year or so, and upon discovering that what he thought was communism, as an American political party philosophy, was, in fact, a party whose ideology and direction came from foreign sources, he withdrew and has become anticommunistic and a substantial foe of the Communist philosophy and objectives in this country. This young man, who was then about 21 years of age, was retained, for a time, on the pay roll of TVA by the personnel office, apparently upon the basis that the Authority believed the facts in connection with his prior renunciation and abandonment of his former beliefs.

The evidence also indicates that there were probably not more than 50 or 60 known Communists in the entire State of Tennessee at the time of this investigation.

Had disciplinary action not been taken by the Tennessee Valley Authority in connection with these cases, it undoubtedly would justify vigorous criticism, but it would seem fairly conclusive to say that the Dies committee, then intensively engaged in investigating and acting against subversive movements and people, seemed satisfied with the results and pursued the matter no further.

The sum total of the record before the Senate section of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy fails to disclose that David E. Lilienthal is either a Communist, a "fellow traveler," or that he has at any time encouraged or supported Communist activities.

This is not to say that the mere lack of evidence of any "fellow traveler" or communistic sympathy leaves the matter in doubt. It does not. I think the evidence affirmatively shows that Mr. Lilienthal is fundamentally committed to the basic principles of Americanism with a deep and intelligent understanding of all the connotations of those principles.

The evidence further establishes, in my mind, that Mr. Lilienthal is a man of high intelligence, great administrative ability, and vigorous devotion to the successful operation of any enterprise with which he is associated. It is entirely possible that I might disagree with him on certain important partisan political matters, but my conception of the administration of the atomic-energy program in this country is that it is one field that must be above pure partisanship; that it must be conducted with a vigorous and impartial conception of basic security, and, at present, of the necessity for the over-all preeminence of the United States.

The record further discloses no conclusions of dishonorable conduct on the part of Mr. Lilienthal but, on the contrary, leaves the conviction that he is possessed of an idealism, controversial perhaps to some, but nevertheless an idealism conceived and founded upon the basis of human rights.

An impressive part of the evidence is involved in the testimony of Dr. Arthur E. Morgan and the suggestions that may flow from it. To me the evidence here indicates a conflict of administrative methods and concepts of objectives. I believe Dr. Morgan is a fine engineer and honest, but I believe the conflict between Dr. Morgan and Mr. Lilienthal was one between a builder of physical properties on the one hand and an advocate of a conception of administrative progress on the other. Mr. Lilienthal was much younger, no doubt possessing an ambition and a vigor restless with professional detail; and perhaps two able people, each with a different perspective, clashed in their viewpoints without ever having arrived at a fundamental common ground of understanding.

The list of preeminent people, American citizens of the highest trust, who gave testimony urging the confirmation of Mr. Lilienthal is impressive. May I recite a few? The Honorable Dean Acheson, Under Secretary of State; Dr. Vannevar Bush, head of the Carnegie Institution of Washington and perhaps the man who was trusted above all others in connection with the development and production of our most secret and technical weapons of war; Dr. Karl T. Compton, president of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology; Dr. James Conant, president of Harvard University; Dr. John S. Dickey, president of Dartmouth College; Hon. Bernard M. Baruch, who needs no identification in the United States; Mr. John M. Hancock, one of the ablest business administrators and executives in our country; Mr. Joseph H. Lane, president of the Cavalier Corp.; Mr. John Lord O'Brian, one of America's leading attorneys; the Honorable Robert P. Patterson, Secretary of War; Mr. Charles A. Thomas, vice president of Monsanto Chemical Co.; Mr. Harry A. Winne, vice president, General Electric Co.; Mr. Prentiss Brown, one of the leading private utility executives of the United States and a former Member of this body; the American Farm Bureau Federation; the Reverend Thomas E. O'Connell, on behalf of the Catholic Committee of the South; Bishop E. H. Hughes, of the Methodist Episcopal Church; dozens if not hundreds of endorsement messages by the clergy of our major religious denominations; a great number of civic and public-spirited organizations; and very significantly indeed the editorial approval of his appointment of leading newspaper editors of both major political parties from coast to coast.

While it is true that pressure group organizations as such should not dictate legislation because of pressure, I nevertheless say, Mr. President, that such cosmopolitan endorsement cannot be treated lightly. We have had undeniable pressure group activity both for and against Mr. Lilienthal, and where this is apparent, as it often is, it should be either credited or discounted as knowledge of the motives and methods may be apparent. If we approach the confirmation of Mr. Lilienthal, however, under all of the contingencies, demands, and vital requirements of this moment, we must conclude that he is considered by a wide variety of American public opinion to be acceptable as Chairman of the Commission.

I fully realize that many people who write their Senators do it as a result of the urging of some organization head, but the thinking of the individuals in the list I have recited, of those who speak for groups, must undoubtedly be the considered judgment of individuals who are informed and who speak as a result of mature thinking.

May I say again, in concluding this statement, that there are vital issues at stake today of controlling import. The members of this Commission, now subject to confirmation, have been in control of our entire atomic energy program for over 4 months. Their terms of office expire, under the law, in less than 18 months. The continuity of our development in the atomic energy field is absolutely essential to our national security at this time. The confusion and chaos that would be necessitated by a repudiation of the Presidential appointments at this time and the mad scramble for satisfactory replacements for this Commission would be almost fatal to our program. The practical problems of now securing the services of other satisfactory individuals to step into a job that can only be confirmed for 17 months in this experimental, pioneering and still uncertain field would be almost insurmountable.

If I had any sound conviction that the character or trustworthiness, from a national standpoint, of any of these appointees had been reasonably in question I should vote against them, but in my opinion it has not. The most I could say is that there may be members with whose incidental views I might on occasion be in opposition but concerning whom in no instance can I question the basic American integrity or loyalty.

The administrative policies either now set up or proposed by this Commission may be the subject of some dispute but I earnestly point out to you that the law has provided for the establishment of a joint committee on this subject whose duty it is to study and examine the development and progress of this science. This committee does not propose to order the technical details of atomic energy, but I assure you that the committee will, in harmony with the over-all best interests of our Nation, continue its studies of this new venture and that the committee shall, as a representative of this Congress, under its responsibility work with this Commission to guarantee a program for atomic energy that will safeguard our interests and preserve our preeminence.

Mr. President, as I stated in the formal statement I have just made, most of it, at least in the latter part, was devoted to Mr. Lilienthal, but I may point out that what was said about him by the various prominent people and individuals and organizations that came before our committee and testified, was told to us also concerning every other appointee to the Commission. We found, for instance, that these appointees are men of experience and ability. Perhaps they are not, any of them, atomic scientists, but they are men whose records in the past show them to have been tremendously successful in their various fields of activity.

Mr. Lilienthal is an administrator, a lawyer by profession, but an administrator who has proven his ability to administer and conduct large enterprise very successfully. Mr. Lewis Strauss is an investment banker of long experience with extensive governmental experience interspersed with his private activities, and a man who, has had, as a layman, I believe, more practical contact with nuclear fission than any other member of the Commission. The evidence developed I believe that it was about 1936 or 1937 that he began with his own private funds to aid in the investigation of this field. He was not trying to produce atomic energy as we now refer to it, but he was interested in nuclear fission, in one way or another, because his interest was in cancer research and, as a layman, he contributed substantial funds and maintained a constant interest in the whole atomic field. He is in my judgment one of the best qualified laymen, with an understanding of this particular line of scientific activity, that could be found.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BRIDGES. The Senator does not mean to imply by his speech that these men are the best qualified men in the United States for the job, does he?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I think all honesty would cause me to say "no"; I do not think they are necessarily the best men. I do not know, in my own mind, exactly who would be the best men in the United States. However, I will say to the Senator that I believe they are amply able and amply capable, and I am satisfied that they can conduct the activities of this Commission with credit to themselves and with benefit to the country.

Mr. BRIDGES. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. BRIDGES. As a matter of fact, what the committee of which the distinguished Senator is chairman did was to determine not whether these were the best qualified men in the United States for the job but to determine that in the judgment of the Senator from Iowa and his colleagues on the committee the men appointed were not too bad for the job. Is not that true?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, I am delighted to answer that question.

It is not the province of our committee or of any committee of the Senate to canvass all the citizens of the United States to see whether the President appointed the best men for the job. The appointing responsibility is in the President. We have only an examining and confirming responsibility. If the President has sent us the nomination of somebody who is completely incapable or has other defects which in our judgment would make it impossible for him to give reasonably proper service in that job, then I think we should consider it from that angle. As I said to the Senator a while ago, I do not know that I would want the voters in the State of Iowa to examine too carefully to see whether they could pick out somebody better to send here in my place.

Mr. BRIDGES. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. BRIDGES. I would rather take a chance on the proposition the Senator stated than I would on some of the nominees for this Commission, for I think the Senator would stand a much better chance than the nominees to the Commission.

I want to ask the Senator if it is not a very sad commentary upon the United States of America today that first the committee, and now the Senate, instead of deliberating on the question of whether the nominees to this all-important Commission are the ablest, are on the lower level of trying to determine whether they are the worst qualified; whether Mr. Lilienthal is too bad for the job. In my opinion it is a matter of judgment, and in my judgment he is; in the judgment of the Senator from Iowa apparently he is not. It is a matter of degree of judgment whether this man, appointed to this great office, is too bad for the job. That is a very sad commentary.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, I do not want to adopt the Senator's premises as mine in this philosophic approach to the matter. I will say that I am not certain in my own mind exactly what kind of a man should be chosen to be Chairman of the Commission, or exactly what kind of a person should be a member of the Commission for the reason that we have no history of the operation of atomic energy. We have no pattern to guide us. We do not know where we are going in the future.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. May I finish this statement? I am trying to say to the Senator that there is a great question in my mind as to whether or not we would need the most capable scientist in the world to operate this project, or the best businessman, or where the qualifications of the Chairman should lie. I have come to the conclusion, at least until experience teaches me differently, if it ever does, that in the policy making at the top we probably need more intelligent business administration in this matter than we do meticulous scientific direction. All scientists work in laboratories.

Mr. BRIDGES. The Senator said that he has not determined whether we need a great businessman or a great scientist. In Mr. Lilienthal we have neither. He is neither a good businessman nor a good scientist. So by the Senator's own formula he should have disqualified Mr. Lilienthal.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I do not think that is quite a proper assumption. I said a moment ago that I have come to the conclusion that this is an administrative job, and I think the record of Mr. Lilienthal shows that he is one of the most outstanding administrators of a public activity that has ever been produced in this country. I think he is unusually outstanding as a public administrator.

Mr. BRIDGES. He probably can spend Government money, the taxpayers' money, faster than almost any other man in the country—I think the Senator is right about that—with very little accounting to the Congress from which he received the funds.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. His money-spending proclivities may be great. I do not know. But he is a good administrator, an excellent one; I think a completely outstanding administrator. And this particular activity calls for a high type of administration.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Yes.

Mr. BRIDGES. The Senator said, as I understood him, that we have no pattern of the past to guide us; that we are going into an unknown future field, and therefore the Senator cannot decide what type of man he wants. In that case, does not the distinguished Senator from Iowa think he has a very distinct duty to his country and to the Senate to look more thoroughly into the background of these men than he would have ordinarily, and does not the Senator think that if there is the slightest taint on any of them that either they should be big enough to step out of the picture or the Senator from Iowa and his colleagues should advise they be turned down?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I will say to the Senator that what was before our committee was not the obligation to search the country and look over this one and that one and the other one and make comparisons. Our job and our obligation was to examine the appointments the President had made and sent to the Senate. We have no power to appoint. We have no power to select. We would be considered offensive if we recommended to the President whom he should appoint. We are a legislative body and his responsibility is the appointing power. Therefore it was our duty to see whether or not the appointees were able, whether there was anything fundamentally against them which would mitigate against the proper performance of their duty, the able performance of their duty, and we came to the conclusion that the appointees met those tests. That is the limit of our responsibility.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. OVERTON. I am wondering if the able Senator from Iowa will agree with me in the suggestion that the head of this most important Commission should have the unqualified, or practically unqualified, confidence of the Congress of the United States. He will require the cooperation of the Congress if he is to make a success of this great venture. If Mr. Lilienthal is of the very high type which the able Senator has portrayed, does not the Senator think he would, when he knows, as he must know, that a very substantial number of the Members of the United States Senate quite seriously object to his confirmation, of his own accord withdraw? Must he not realize that if he is confirmed he is going to be confirmed under a cloud which will adhere to him throughout his administration?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I will say to the Senator that the fact that there might be some objection to Mr. Lilienthal is not to me a sound or a controlling argument. I recall that in the last Presidential election almost 50 percent of the people did not agree with the President, who had been elected on the other party's ticket, and who in the past had been doing a job apparently satisfactorily to about 55 percent of the people. I do not think the question of division of opinion is a logical or a warranted argument.

Mr. OVERTON. If the Senator will pardon me further, that is an entirely different proposition.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I think the position of the President is the greatest position in the world.

Mr. OVERTON. And it is always a matter of contest between the two great parties in the United States. When we come to the matter of selecting the head of the Atomic Commission it is not a question of republicanism against democracy, or democracy against republicanism; it is a question of selecting one who enjoys the confidence of both Democrats and Republicans.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, we would have to go a step further. He must be able to do the job. It is not sufficient that we have confidence in him. He must also be able to perform his task.

Mr. OVERTON. Certainly. He must have ability, faithfulness, and energy, and he must also above all other things have the confidence of the Congress of the United States, or he will not make a success of it.

Mr. BRICKER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. BRICKER. The Senator from Iowa mentioned a moment ago that Mr. Lilienthal is a man of high or great administrative ability. I should like to have the Senator give to the Senate his definition of great administrative ability.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. That may be a matter of degree that appeals differently to different people. I said I believed that Mr. Lilienthal was a man of high or great ability administratively. I have been in the Tennessee Valley, but I am not familiar with it at all. I never have been there to inspect the Tennessee Valley installations. But I have talked about it with people I have known intimately for several years. I know one engineer especially who has worked in the Valley for a number of years as an engineer in the TVA. I know a number of other people, both in TVA and who live in the Valley and who have lived there for a number of years. I know that they speak universally of the outstanding efficiency with which Mr. Lilienthal, as Chairman, has operated the TVA. I have also received recommendations from people in Government who have examined and audited and looked over the administrative set-up down there and who speak extremely highly of the efficiency and the orderliness and the progress with which that institution is conducted. It is an institution of considerable size. I know there are quarrels respecting the methods of operation, but, after all, as I understand, it has been operated in the way Congress voted.

Does that answer the question of the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BRICKER. That does not answer me, but that is the Senator's definition.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. That is correct.

Mr. BRICKER. Let me ask one further question. Is it not true that there has been great resistance on the part of Mr. Lilienthal to an accounting to the Congress or the Government with respect to the financial operations of the great Tennessee Valley Authority?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I do not so understand, Mr. President.

Mr. BRIDGES, Mr. TAYLOR, and Mr. McMAHON addressed the Chair.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield first to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BRIDGES. The Senator has just stated that he does not so understand. I have been a Member of the Senate for 11 years. If the Senator does not understand it, he should examine the records of the Appropriations Committee if there is any question in his mind. He certainly would understand then.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, I did not complete my statement. I said that I did not so understand. I do understand that Mr. Lilienthal had certain philosophies of operating a publicly owned enterprise of this kind, and that among those ideas was the idea that the restrictions and slowness of legislative action did not make for efficiency. I am not arguing that philosophy one way or the other. However, he argued that that plant could operate successfully only under certain conditions which did not permit the TVA, for example, to be hamstrung by what he thought might be legislative action. That attitude may be right or wrong. I understand that he fought for that philosophy, and that he entered into some rather pointed arguments. Perhaps he was a lobbyist. I do not know. But apparently the Congress agreed with Mr. Lilienthal. I have talked with representatives of the auditing department. Some time ago someone came to me and said that the General Accounting Office had some very sharp criticism of Mr. Lilienthal because he had been doing things that were wrong. So just as we tried to follow up every other lead, I went to the General Accounting Office to examine the reports of the audit. There is not one word of criticism against Mr. Lilienthal for the past 2 or 3 years. That business is being operated according to the laws that Congress laid down. Perhaps Mr. Lilienthal was a little too vigorous in advancing his views, but apparently Congress agreed with him.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. McMAHON. When I first rose to ask the Senator to yield, I wished to point out exactly what he has pointed out, namely, that it was the responsibility of the Congress, to itself and to the people of the United States, to change the organic TVA Act, instead of blaming Mr. Lilienthal for, shall we say, advocating that it be kept as it was.

I wish to point out further to the Senate that the nomination of Mr. Lilienthal as the TVA Administrator was confirmed practically unanimously in 1945, after 11 years of his administration of that office.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. Did the Senator from Iowa in his investigation find any evidence whatsoever—even a scintilla of evidence—that Mr. Lilienthal has been guilty of any dishonesty in the administration of TVA, so far as the books are concerned?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. No. I have never heard any individual charge Mr. Lilienthal with personal dishonesty in operating the TVA. Some have said that he has been ruthless; some have said that he overrode others; but I have never heard anyone accuse him of being personally dishonest. I am convinced that the man is personally honest.

Mr. MORSE. Did the Senator find any evidence whatever of any concealment on the part of Mr. Lilienthal in keeping the books of TVA?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Not the least.

Mr. MORSE. Did the Senator find that under the accounting system he was entitled to maintain under the congressional law his books were open books?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I am not enough of an accountant to know whether they were "open" books or not. The records were available. I could find no evidence in the General Accounting Office that there had been any concealment or failure or inability to get at the books of the TVA.

Mr. MORSE. The Senator has already stated that, so far as the committee which investigated Mr. Lilienthal is concerned, the evidence shows that he has administered TVA in accordance with the letter of the congressional act establishing the TVA.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I will say to the Senator from Oregon that the evidence does not necessarily show that conclusively. There is a dispute. The distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] disputes that Mr. Lilienthal is conducting his financial reporting and his financial structure in accordance with the law. I disagree in a friendly way with the Senator from Tennessee on that point. He does not agree that Mr. Lilienthal is conducting the business and accounting of TVA as it should be conducted. I will say to the Senator from Oregon that, so far as my opinion is concerned, the evidence is clear that it is being conducted perfectly proper.

Mr. MORSE. I should like to ask one further question on that point. I also understand the Senator from Iowa to say, in effect, that, so far as the General Accounting Office is concerned, it makes no charge that he is not administering the accounting of TVA in accordance with the law.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. That is correct, according to the statements made to me.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. McMAHON. Of course the Senator from Tennessee is present, and he can correct me if he wishes to do so. I have always understood the position of the Senator from Tennessee to be not as the Senator from Iowa stated, namely, that Mr. Lilienthal was not complying with the provisions of the law. As I understand, the Senator from Tennessee believes that the law should be changed.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I did not undertake to interpret the position of the Senator from Tennessee. The Senator from Oregon asked me if there was any evidence on the point, and I could not say that there was no evidence, because I knew that the Senator from Tennessee disagreed. I expect that at the proper time he will make his own position clear. If I have misstated it, I apologize.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be glad to make my position known now.

It will be recalled that I took the position at all times that it was Mr. Lilienthal's duty to account to the Congress of the United States for the money we had given him and the properties we had turned over to him. It has always been my position that he should account to the Government as does every other officer. I believe the act so provides. Mr. Lilienthal took a different position, and therefore I introduced a bill on this subject several years ago, which the Senate passed, requiring him to account just as do the Post Office Department, the Civil Service Commission, the War Department, the Navy Department, and every other department of Government, for the money turned over to them. Mr. Lilienthal is substantially the only one of any importance who does not account to the Congress for the money placed in his hands as trustee. He did not do so. He came to Washington and lobbied against the bill, but the Senate overwhelmingly passed it, as I recall. I can obtain information as to the vote. The bill went to the House of Representatives, and, with President Roosevelt's help, he had the bill defeated in the House. It was either smothered or defeated—I have forgotten which.

Mr. BARKLEY and Mr. WHERRY addressed the Chair.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield first to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I think probably my question should have been asked earlier when the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON] suggested a while ago that Mr. Lilienthal should withdraw his name because there was substantial opposition to it. I recall two outstanding instances which, if such a rule of propriety upon the part of nominees had been applied this country would have been deprived of two fine, outstanding judicial officers. I recall that when President Wilson nominated Louis D. Brandeis for the Supreme Court there was long and bitter opposition in the Senate to the confirmation of his nomination. The nomination was finally confirmed and he became one of the great Justices of the Supreme Court, taking his place along with Justice Holmes, to whom there was considerable similarity.

I also recall that when President Hoover nominated Mr. Hughes as Chief Justice of the United States there was bitter opposition to Mr. Hughes, and on the final roll call I think there were approximately 28 votes cast in the Senate against confirmation of his nomination. I am probably not precise, but it was a considerable number. Yet Mr. Hughes, in my judgment, was one of the great Chief Justices of the United States.

So if there had existed in the past, or now exists, any rule of propriety which would require a nominee to withdraw his name because there was bitter or intense or great opposition, the Nation would in the past have lost, and will no doubt in the future lose the services of outstanding men in many capacities for which they are nominated.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. I had thought that the Senator from Iowa was about to conclude, and I wanted to say something else, but the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] remind me of the most extraordinary rule which was propounded a while ago by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] that the committee had the duty and obligation, in acting on a Presidential nomination, to reject the nomination unless the person nominated was the best qualified person in the United States for the position. Never before, I think, in the history of the Senate has anyone ever advanced such a rule as that, and never could it be truthfully said that any man has advanced or could advance such a proposition as that and stand on the Constitution of the United States, which gives the President of the United States the sole right to nominate and the Senate the right to advise and consent. I certainly hope that the people of New Hampshire will never adopt such a rule as that when they select their Senators, lest we might lose one of our most esteemed and valuable Members.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BRIDGES. When the Senator from Kentucky puts David Lilienthal on the same high plane of American public opinion, that Louis Brandeis and Charles Evans Hughes enjoyed, it is an inappropriate reflection on the memory of Mr. Brandeis and Mr. Hughes. I for one resent having Lilienthal placed on the same level with those two great men.

Mr. BARKLEY. I did not intend to incite the resentment of the Senator from New Hampshire. I remembered those two oustanding instances and cited them in contradistinction to the theory which I thought my friend from Louisiana advanced, that when there is outstanding or vigorous or bitter opposition to a man for any appointment he ought to withdraw his name for that reason. I did not mean to put Mr. Lilienthal in the class with Chief Justice Hughes as a lawyer or with Mr. Justice Brandeis as a lawyer. I do not entertain the contempt for Mr. Lilienthal that the Senator from New Hampshire seems to entertain, but I do entertain the same very high reverential regard that the Senator no doubt entertains for former Chief Justice Hughes and the late Justice Brandeis.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. BRIDGES. The Senator from New Hampshire does not entertain any contempt for Mr. Lilienthal. Let me say to the Senator from New Mexico, in reply to his remark that this is the first time the Senate has been called upon to confirm an Atomic Energy Commission, that this is the first time in the history of the United States that an attempt has been made to choose a man to head the Atomic Energy Commission, a commission which is to develop and control a force which may destroy this country and the world. So I have no apologies to offer when I say that we should get the best qualified man in the United States for the chairmanship. Of course, we should. If the President does not nominate for the position an outstanding man, one of the best qualified in the United States, we should reject the nomination.

So far as concerns the statement of the Senator from New Mexico regarding the people in New Hampshire having an opportunity to pass upon Senators if the rule is applied to them, I will take a chance in New Hampshire, just as the Senator from New Mexico will in his State, and I will be in the Senate as long as he.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I certainly regret that my friend the Senator from New Hampshire took any offense at what I said. I was merely trying to be facetious in my remarks.

Mr. BARKLEY. I thought the Senator from New Mexico was trying to pay the Senator from New Hampshire a compliment.

Mr. HATCH. I failed in trying to be funny. The funniest thing in the Senate is the present attitude of the Senator from New Hampshire. I am sorry if I offended the Senator. Perhaps he may be in the Senate long after I am gone and forgotten. If that is the Senator's desire and wish, and the wish of his people, so may it be.

But, Mr. President, I quite well recall that the Senator from New Hampshire has never been too friendly to the Tennessee Valley Authority. I can quite well understand his opposition to Mr. Lilienthal, who has made such a success of the Tennessee Valley Authority. I remember that many years ago on the floor of the Senate the Senator from New Hampshire rose and made a vigorous protest against the Tennessee Valley Authority in connection with a certain jackass which had been purchased. On that occasion the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] very ably and eloquently answered the Senator from New Hampshire and demonstrated that he did not know a word about the subject of which he was talking. I also recall quite well when the great and able late Senator from Nebraska, George Norris, challenged the Senator from New Hampshire on the floor of the Senate as to his opposition toward the public power developed by the Tennessee Valley Authority when the Senator from New Hampshire was taking a position in favor of private-power development.

If we are to consider such questions there will be a great deal of debate and argument. I assure the Senator from New Hampshire that in my first remarks I was merely trying to be facetious; and I say again that if he took offense at anything I said I shall certainly be glad to withdraw my remarks.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, I have very little further to say. I should like to canvass the other members of the Commission and give their background; but I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. WHERRY. A while ago the Senator made the statement that he was not sure whether the Chairman of the Commission should have a background that was scientific or a background of business ability. I believe that was the Senator's statement.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I said there was doubt in my mind as to whether those questions have been answered, because of the uncertainty.

Mr. WHERRY. Would the Senator care to express an opinion as to whether or not Mr. Lilienthal was selected because of his scientific background? Would the Senator, who is supporting Mr. Lilienthal, vote to confirm his nomination because he had a scientific background?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Not necessarily.

Mr. WHERRY. Would the Senator say that his support is because of Mr. Lilienthal's business ability?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. My support for Mr. Lilienthal comes about in this way: First, he is an outstanding nominee; second, he is able; third, he is honest, and I can find no substantial reason which, to me at least, indicates that he is not qualified to do a business-like job in the position for which he has been named.

Mr. WHERRY. That still does not answer my question. Does the Senator select him because of his scientific background or because of his business background?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I did not select him. The President appointed him. I do not know why the President appointed him. But I have come to the conclusion that he is able to do the job.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield once more to me?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I am glad to yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I was referring to the statement the Senator previously made. Of course, all he has said here is that Mr. Lilienthal is honest. I take it there are 140,000,000 American peeople who are honest.

I wish to go back to the reasons why the Senator from Iowa supported Mr. Lilienthal, and I wish to ask a question of the Senator in terms of the statement he has previously made. The Senator from Iowa said he had reached the point where he did not know whether the head of the Atomic Energy Commission should have a scientific background or a background of ability as a business administrator. I ask the Senator on what basis he himself decided that he should vote to confirm the nomination of Mr. Lilienthal. I wish to ask once again whether the Senator from Iowa felt that the nomination of Mr. Lilienthal should be confirmed because of Mr. Lilienthal's scientific background or because of his business ability.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, Mr. Lilienthal has practically no scientific background.

Mr. WHERRY. That is correct.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. He is a businessman of ability. I do not wish to be misunderstood; I do not wish Senators to understand that I am in a fog about who should be appointed to the position. That is not quite the case. I said that we are in a pioneering field. No one knows what the future of atomic energy will be, except by conjecture. We know we can make an atomic bomb. We think it will do certain things, and we have some idea of what its effect in the field of biology may be. We have had no experience with an Atomic Energy Commission in peacetime. There is no pattern to go by. We do not know, and I defy anyone today to say that atomic energy would be better served in the United States, over the next 20 years, by establishing as the head of the Atomic Energy Commission a highly trained specialist in atomic energy or a businessman with experience as an administrator. I do not know, but I believe Mr. Lilienthal is a man of ability and experience in government administration, and I believe he can do that job. That is why I am for him.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to complete my question?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Yes.

Mr. WHERRY. I should like to point out to the distinguished Senator from Iowa the record of the hearings which his committee held, and on the basis of which his committee made its report to the Senate. On page 4 of the hearings, at the bottom of the page, in answer to a question asked by the chairman, who inquired about Mr. Lilienthal's engineering experience, Mr. Lilienthal made this reply:

> I am a lawyer by profession and training. I am not an engineer, nor do I have any technical or scientific background worth mentioning.

So from a scientific point of view, certainly one would not select that background for this administrator.

On page 5, the next page, question was asked as to his business ability. He maintained, not only throughout the testimony on page 5, but also on page 6, that he is an administrator.

That does not seem to me to indicate that he sets himself up at all as being a businessman in any sense of the word, nor as one who has a scientific background.

So I point out to the distinguished Senator from Iowa that when we consider the two requisites which the Senator stated largely governed his action in voting for the confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Lilienthal—namely, that the head of this Commission must have either a scientific background or a business background—we find that the report does not reveal that Mr. Lilienthal has either one, but merely shows that he is an administrator.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. McMAHON. Supplementing the answer given a moment ago by the distinguished Senator from Iowa, I wish to point out that until the atomic energy plants were developed, the Tennessee Valley Authority was to my knowledge, the largest business enterprise this Government ever engaged in in all its history, and it has been an outstanding success. The success of the Tennessee Valley Authority is attested by the people who have lived with it, by fine men, businessmen, who came before the committee and testified to the worth and utility of this great development and gave Mr. Lilienthal credit for making it what it is.

Let me point out further to the Senator from Nebraska that Mr. Lilienthal's capabilities and qualifications for this post have been testified to, in the record.

Mr. WHERRY. As what?

Mr. McMAHON. His capabilities and qualifications.

Mr. WHERRY. For what?

Mr. McMAHON. For this post. Mr. President, Owen D. Young; Karl Compton, president of Massachusetts Institute of Technology; James Conant, president of Harvard University; Beardsley Ruml; and Bernard Baruch are among those whose names now come to my mind; and a dozen others whom I can point out in the record, have testified that in their opinion this man is well qualified to administer this post. In fact, most of them said he is better qualified than anyone else they know of.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me once more?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Connecticut if he will tell us what particular qualifications, business ability, or scientific ability they testified to. If the Senator means his business ability, let me say that I have been a member of the Appropriations Committee for nearly 5 years; and during that time we have appropriated $626,000,000 to the Tennessee Valley Authority, and it has paid back only $17,000,000. Is that a test of his business ability?

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I suppose there are several other tests which can be applied. I have some recollection of some testimony in the record to the effect that it would have been impossible to have 100,000 airplanes built in the United States and flown abroad in 1 year without the Tennessee Valley Authority. It has also been testified in the record that the whole character of the Tennessee Valley has been changed for the better, that private enterprise has flourished and grown, and that it has done so under the leadership and direction of Mr. Lilienthal, the Chairman of the Board of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

The men I have named are men who have worked with Mr. Lilienthal on that very problem, which he was chosen by the President to administer—namely, atomic energy.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me once more?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I should like to make a brief observation in answer to what has been stated by the Senator from Connecticut. I have no quarrel with the men who have testified for Mr. Lilienthal. They have a perfect right to say they are for him—and a great many persons have said they were for him. I ask the Senator to state what particular outstanding ability of Mr. Lilienthal's they testified about. It certainly was not his scientific ability, because Mr. Lilienthal disqualifies himself on that ground. It certainly was not his business ability, because Mr. Lilienthal says he is an administrator. After reading his record, I cannot find anything that indicates he has scientific or business ability.

I am not opposing the Tennessee Valley Authority, and this is not a fight. Prentiss Brown, a private-power man, unqualifiedly testified in behalf of Mr. Lilienthal; there is no question about that.

But I should like to inquire whether there is anything outstanding about Mr. Lilienthal's business ability which qualifies him to be Administrator of the Atomic Energy Commission.

Mr. McMAHON. Simply the fact that he has made an outstanding success of the greatest business enterprise this Government has operated in all its history.

Mr. WHERRY. Does the Senator mean that spending $606,000,000 and getting back $17,000,000 is an outstanding success?

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, the question is not to be stated in terms of the investment of dollars and the return of dollars. It cannot be measured in that way, and the Congress which passed the Tennessee Valley Authority Act knew it could not be measured in those terms, and did not propose that it should be. I say that an appraisal of the physical assets, to say nothing of the human resources, of the Tennessee Valley will show that the Senator's reading of the balance sheet is sadly in error.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield once more to me?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I am stating that the measuring stick for financial ability and for business ability is dollars and cents. We are not talking about the benefits to this particular group of people or to that particular group. Such a statement can be made in regard to any project; and if we begin to discuss the problem in such terms, we may never get through with it.

I say to the Senator from Connecticut that if he states that this man is being selected because of his business ability, I should like to ascertain what record shows that anyone has endorsed him because of his business ability.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield once more to me, to permit me to reply to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. McMAHON. Perhaps it is not a fair question, and I do not have the record at my immediate disposal; but earlier I mentioned the fact that 2 years ago Mr. Lilienthal was nominated by the President of the United States for reappointment to a term as head of the Tennessee Valley Authority. As I recall, the Senator from Nebraska did not vote against that appointment.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, that is an entirely different matter from the one we are discussing now, and it has not a thing to do with the statement made by the Senator from Iowa that this man was qualified because he had scientific ability or business ability.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Iowa will indulge me just once more, the objection of the Senator from Nebraska to this man was on the basis that he is a poor businessman, or at least that he had not business capabilities, and the Senator attempted to demonstrate it by looking at the balance sheet. I say to the Senator that that issue should have been met by him, if he really believed what he contends, when the man was appointed to hold the office in which the Senator claims he has made such a disastrous record.

Mr. WHERRY. I think that is very unfair. I have not said anything about this man in the TVA. I say that the committee have not presented us any testimony as to his financial ability and his success. They come forward and state that the TVA is the one thing they are staking his reputation on, and I ask the Senator what his measuring stick is. If it is dollars and cents, we have appropriated $626,000,000, and we have gotten back $17,000,000.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President——

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I have been trying to yield to the Senator from Tennessee for about 10 minutes. I shall yield to the Senator from Vermont later.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, something was said about the associates of Mr. Lilienthal in the Tennessee Valley Authority testifying for him. I call to the attention of Senators the fact, as shown by the record, that the only associate of Mr. Lilienthal who appeared to testify in the hearing was Dr. A. E. Morgan, whose place Mr. Lilienthal secured in some way. Dr. Morgan testified against him. Mr. Pope, one of his other associates, did not come forward to testify at all; was not brought here to testify. Dr. H. A. Morgan, his other associate, did not appear to testify at all. No one of his associates in the whole organization came forward and testified about Mr. Lilienthal except Dr. A. E. Morgan. They passed him up. Even the four Members of Congress from Tennessee who appeared before the other committee and testified for Mr. Clapp did not testify for Mr. Lilienthal. Not a soul among his associates from the TVA, his employees, none of them, not a single one, came here and testified, save Dr. A. E. Morgan, and if ever one man skinned another in testimony, and proved it as he went along, it was done on that occasion. By looking at the record it will be seen that Dr. A. E. Morgan literally charged Lilienthal with every offense known to man, and then took the trouble to prove it as he went along. Mr. Lilienthal was present when that testimony was taken, and never answered a single word of his former associate's testimony.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I was interested in the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska, and particularly his statement that the Government had invested $625,000,000 in the Tennessee Valley Authority and is getting back only something like $17,000,000 a year.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no, Mr. President. Will the Senator let me say that that was a mistake? It was just $17,000,000 all told—and I think that is too large an estimate. During the whole time he has been receiving this large income, he has not been paying it in, and has not been allowing the Government to see what he had received, either.

Mr. AIKEN. It is a fact that a large part of this expenditure of $625,000,000 has not been in process long enough for returns to begin to come back to the Government from it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Thirty-five million dollars last year, and for the last 4 or 5 years not far from that. For 6 or 7 years it was something like from twenty-five to thirty million dollars. That is a pretty considerable sum, and we have no accounting for any of it.

Mr. AIKEN. We have had an audit of the Tennessee Valley Authority, by agreement with the Comptroller General's office for a good many years. The Tennessee Valley Authority has been returning a good many million dollars a year to the United States Treasury, but it has been reappropriated for more capital investment the next year. If we have $625,000,000 invested and earning $17,000,000 a year, as the Senator from Nebraska states, he is giving evidence of the kind of Administrator Mr. Lilienthal is, because there probably is not a private corporation in this country that has invested $625,000,000 and is amortizing $17,000,000 a year.

Mr. McKELLAR. And it has not been done here.

Mr. AIKEN. That means it would be paid off in 36 years. And we know that $625,000,000 has not all been spent for power purposes. Some of it has been spent for navigation, some of it for soil improvement, some of it for other purposes. I would say that if he can amortize the entire cost for the Tennessee Valley Authority in 35 or 36 years, he can make a record which very few persons in this country can equal.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, I will merely say that our record at least shows no such accomplishment as the Senator from Vermont is referring to at all.

Mr. AIKEN. I was quoting the figures from the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. BRIDGES. The Senator from Vermont has forgotten one thing. He forgot to say that if any amount of that money ever came back, very little of it ever stopped in the Treasury of the United States. So that what the Senator said as to amortization is not correct.

Mr. AIKEN. It was reappropriated for more capital extension the next year.

Mr. BRIDGES. But little of it has ever remained in the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. It could have stopped in the Treasury any time Congress had seen fit to stop it there, and if Congress had not considered it a good investment, it undoubtedly would have kept it in the Treasury.

Mr. McMAHON. I should like to point out for the record that the Senator from Tennessee, who has just commented on the fiscal situation, has, I think, a very justifiable pride in the fact that he has been, probably more than any other individual in this country, responsible for securing every dollar of the appropriations which went into the building of the Tennessee Valley Authority. Furthermore, the money was not all appropriated at one time. True, I was not a Member of the Senate when the project was started, but I have heard the Senator from Tennessee graphically describe the burden he carried in making his contribution to this great undertaking. I congratulate the Senator from Tennessee on having made that record.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield? It will take me but a moment.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have been an advocate of this project for between 30 and 35 years. Every dollar that went into the project was secured by a vote, as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] can testify as of the later years. I was with it from the beginning. I was a member of the Senate, and of the Committee on Appropriations, when the first appropriation for the Tennessee Valley Authority was obtained by a majority of one, and that one represented a change in the vote of the late Senator Glass. Senator Glass was ill, and I had to serve as Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and Senator Glass gave me his proxy. By a majority of one vote in every substantial contest—and I know the Senator from New Hampshire will bear me out in the statement—every dollar for the TVA was appropriated. Not $650,000,000, as has been stated, but nearer $800,000,000 have gone into this project. So far as I know, no dollar of return has ever gotten back into the Treasury of the United States.

I got the first appropriation through the Senate and then came the conference with the House. The House was opposed to the project. The House Members took a different view of it. They were honestly on the other side, just as my good friend, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], was honestly opposed to it at first. Afterwards he helped put it through, I wish to say for him. But it was carried by a majority of one in the Senate, and when we went to conference with the House, as the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE] will bear me out, because he was a Member of the Senate all that time, and on the Committee on Appropriations and we stayed in conference until the House gave in, and we got the dams built.

Dr. A. E. Morgan built the dams. Lilienthal never had anything to do with the building of the dams. As soon as Dr. Morgan got through with them, had them all in condition so that he knew they were going to be built, Lilienthal came here and honeyfugled around our good friend, Franklin Roosevelt. He just sat around him, and pussyfooted with him, and teased him, and begged him, and got him to give him Dr. A. E. Morgan's place.

Dr. A. E. Morgan built the dams. Dr. A. E. Morgan was the agent there, who was responsible for the dams. Mr. Lilienthal took all the credit for it, as soon as he could get rid of Dr. A. E. Morgan. That testimony is absolutely undisputed.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield for one moment, please?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. McMAHON. A few years ago I had the pleasure of reading a very interesting book entitled "Tennessee Senators as Seen by One of Their Successors," written by the senior Senator from Tennessee. On page 27 I came across this passage about Dr. Morgan:

> When Dr. A. E. Morgan was Chairman of the Tennessee Valley Authority for a season, he came to see me one morning about some matter connected with the Authority. Dr. Morgan claimed to be an engineer, and at times had had some trifling employment in building levees in Arkansas, and for a time was president of the Antioch College in Ohio. He is a strange and peculiar man. For some reason, difficult for me to understand, President Roosevelt took him out of obscurity and made him Chairman of the great Tennessee Valley Authority.

Mr. McKELLAR. Whose statement is that?

Mr. McMAHON. This is the Senator's statement in his book entitled "Tennessee Senators as Seen by One of Their Successors," by Senator MCKELLAR, published by Southern Publishers, in 1942.

Mr. McKELLAR. Those are the facts. Dr. A. E. Morgan is a great engineer, and he built all these dams. Dr. Morgan was exactly "a strange and peculiar man." Most engineers are that way, if the Senators have ever noticed it. Many of them are that way—they have to be that way in order to be good engineers. But they built one of the best series of dams ever built anywhere. There is no other series of dams like them.

Mr. McMAHON. He was qualified for this by "some trifling employment in building levees in Arkansas"?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, he had more than that.

Mr. McMAHON. That is the statement made by the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. I say that, and more, too.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President——

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, I am trying to finish with what I have to say. I do not want to get into a protracted discussion.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I want to refer to something said by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BRIDGES. The Senator from Connecticut made a rather specific statement that because the Senate confirmed Mr. Lilienthal as Director of the TVA a year or two ago, everybody should be wholeheartedly for him as Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission. That is a most far-fetched premise. I do not understand the reasoning of the Senator from Connecticut in making such a suggestion. I had no objection to Mr. Lilienthal as head of the TVA, but I object to his becoming head of the Atomic Energy Commission—a Commission that is going to control a form of energy that could destroy the world, or destroy this Nation. This is an entirely different and far more important issue than TVA.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I believe I know that the majority leader would like to have the Senate adjourn until tomorrow, so at least with this one last remark on my part, I shall take my seat. I yield to no man in this body in a realization of the consequences of that which was done on the desert sands of Alamagordo, in July 1945. I sometimes think that very unfortunately the implications of what was done are not sufficiently appreciated even yet by the American people. Because Mr. Lilienthal has made a success of the Tennessee Valley Authority, the fact that he was chairman of the board is only one reason why I am for him.

I will say to the Senator that I was on the committee. Unlike the Senator from New Hampshire, who had no duty to attend those hearings, I was present at 17 out of 20 hearings. I say to the Senator from New Hampshire it is my conviction, based on the record, that Mr. Lilienthal is not only a fair choice; I even say that he is a wonderful choice to undertake the responsibility, which really is second to none in the affairs of this Government.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, I like to be courteous, but we are getting along, and I should like to conclude my remarks.

Mr. MALONE. It is a matter of correcting an error in the debate.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield to the Senator. Does the Senator want to take exception to the fact that engineers have been said to be "a little bit strange and peculiar?"

Mr. MALONE. Engineers can stand anything—we stand it all the time. But in the debate between the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Vermont, there was some confusion about the $600,000,000 or $617,000,000, of which $17,000,000 was paid back. We will have the record for tomorrow's debate, but as I remember the figures, as they were cited in the Clapp hearings, there was a total of $622,000,000, with a repayment of $17,000,000—not an amortization, as the Senator from Vermont assumed. As to the remainder of the money, the net out of the $54,000,000 gross, taken in from the sale of power each year, was expended in a way that might be determined by the board of the Tennessee Valley Authority for capital investment, and that was charged as repayment to the Government.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. I shall take only a few moments, and I am sure the Senator from Iowa will appreciate my statement, because it sets forth another point of view as to the measuring-stick which has been mentioned as to Mr. Lilienthal's administrative and business ability, namely, the measuring stick that, only $17,000,000 out of some $600,000,000 has been returned from that investment.

I think the point needs to be made that of course the primary objective of TVA was not a business objective at all, in the sense that those who are making these comments apparently have in mind. It was a great social and economic experiment.

How is it possible to measure, for example, in terms of the type of balance sheet of which the Senator from Nebraska has been talking this afternoon, the great value to the economy of the Nation of the conservation program inaugurated in the Tennessee Valley, which the Senator from Tennessee, on more than one occasion, has pointed out to us has been of great value to his State? How are we to measure, for example, the increase in the standard of living of thousands upon thousands of people in the Tennessee Valley which was made possible by that great project? How is it possible to measure the wealth which has been created by this great economic experiment, in the terms of the benefits that have accrued to private business in the Valley? I think that if an attempt were made to measure the great economic benefits which have flowed from the Tennessee Valley Authority it would be found that the $600,000,000 is a very small amount compared with the great increase in national wealth which has flowed from the experiment.

Where is there any private enterprise that could possibly have done what the Congress decided ought to be done in the Tennessee Valley by way of this experiment? In fact, industrialists whom I know tell me that that type of project simply could not be carried on by private industry. That is why the great private utilities in the Pacific Northwest today are pleading with Congress, as can be seen if one goes into the record, to go ahead and build some great dams in the Pacific Northwest, because the private utilities cannot possibly build the dams which are going to be needed to industrialize that section. I think it is very similar to the problem of TVA.

Mr. WHITE. May I inquire of the Senator from Iowa whether he cares to proceed any longer this evening?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I have not too long a statement to make. I wish to canvass the situation with regard to the other members nominated to the Commission, and the general manager. But if the Senator from Maine wants to have the Senate take a recess, with the understanding that I shall have the floor when the Senate reconvenes in executive session, I will be happy to yield for a motion to recess under those circumstances.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WHITE. I yield.

Mr. McMAHON. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the body of the RECORD two editorials and an article of not great length which bear on this debate. I think it would be well, since undoubtedly we will refer to our international pledge for control of atomic energy, for every Senator who is interested to read the two editorials, one from the New York Times and the other from the Washington Post, and the article by Joseph and Stewart Alsop, bearing upon that subject.

There being no objection, the editorials and the article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times]

RESEARCH AND THE BOMB

Appendix 3 of the First Report of the United Nations Atomic Commission indicates roughly how we spent more than two billions up to January 1946 on the atomic bomb—the first statement of account that has thus far been presented to the Nation and the world. Oak Ridge, with its three U-235 plants, cost about a billion, Hanford about $362,000,000, and the bomb laboratory at Los Alamos what seems by comparison a paltry $60,000,000. The rest of the money was spent on subprojects, the construction of the towns of Oak Ridge and Hanford-Richland and on the operation and maintenance of the plants.

As he surveys the history of the atomic bomb in Atomic Information, Dr. J. H. Rush, secretary-treasurer of the Federation of American Scientists, states flatly that "Oak Ridge need never have been built." His reason is that Oak Ridge isolated pure uranium-235, now obsolete. Since Hiroshima bombs have been loaded with plutonium. This is meant not as a reproach but as a lesson. The Oak Ridge plant was a bold, necessary extrapolation, made at a time when uranium-235 was the most promising bomb material. Four methods of separation were devised and a fifth abandoned, and all five were time-consuming and expensive. The development of the plutonium process by the University of Chicago, the Clinton laboratories, and the Hanford plant was cheap in comparison, we are assured, though no comparative costs are given.

The conclusion to be drawn is plain. No competitor of this country will spend a penny on separating uranium-235. It will concentrate on the production of plutonium in the absence of any prohibition by the United Nations. It will conduct its researches in time of peace, so that it will not spend money as lavishly as we did under war pressure. For these reasons the scientists are probably right when they say that in 5 years or so any industrially equipped nation can make atomic bombs loaded with plutonium. What advantage we have in knowledge, skill, and experience is therefore so short-lived that the case for effective international control of atomic energy is a compelling one. A year and a half has already passed since the publication of the Smyth report.

[From the Washington (D. C.) Post]

ATOMIC MONOPOLY

It is somewhat difficult to understand the widespread consternation over recent news that the Canadians now have a chain reacting pile in operation and are stockpiling small amounts of plutonium. Were not the Canadians, along with the British, our partners in this wartime undertaking of nuclear fission? Their scientists contributed, along with our own, to the discoveries which produced the atomic bomb. The actual production was centered here principally because we possessed the industrial and financial resources to carry it through. It can scarcely be doubted that the Canadians have as much right as we to be producing plutonium now.

Our atomic bombs, it will be remembered, were made of both uranium-235 and of plutonium. The plutonium process, J. H. Rush points out in the bulletin of the National Committee on Atomic Information, proved to be at once much simpler and much less expensive than the U-235 separation processes which consumed the major portion of the $2,000,000,000 reportedly expended in atomic-bomb production. We developed, in fact, four separate and independent methods of making these explosive materials. "When no one could be sure that any of these methods would work," says Dr. Rush, "such duplication of effort was justified. But no nation intent on rushing into bomb production will bother to repeat our extravagance (though peacetime power development is another story). It will note that most of our talk of technical secrets and complex industrial know-how centers on the Oak Ridge uranium separation plants—and will make plutonium instead."

Do we, then, have any monopoly for other nations (even those that were not our partners in making the first atomic bombs) to break—save a monopoly of bombs actually produced and perhaps of a few production techniques? If we do not and if, as virtually every scientific authority asserts, it is a matter of only a few years before other nations will be able to produce atomic bombs of their own, would it not be the part of prudence to worry less about secrecy and more about international agreement? Our security does not lie in monopoly. It lies in control.

HOW SOVIETS KIDNAPED A FACTORY

(By Joseph and Stewart Alsop)

According to expert estimates, no less than 7,000 German scientists, technicians, and engineers have been persuaded or kidnaped to work in the Soviet Union—there to produce atomic bombs, long-range guided missiles, bacteriological weapons and other treasures of modern civilization. Intelligence reports from Berlin also tell of an active and quite effective Soviet propaganda to swell this number of prisoner brains.

German scientists beyond Soviet reach are being bombarded by pliable former colleagues in Russia with letters and post cards of the "Having wonderful time; wish you were here" variety. Meanwhile, the kidnapings also continue.

But since it is always easier to understand historic processes in individual terms, the following report from a German scientist who escaped kidnaping probably tells the story better than any statistics. It comes from a leading electronic engineer in the former Oberspree works of the Telefunken Co., and is reproduced in translation with minor excisions.

ALLOWED 30 MINUTES

"On Tuesday, October 22, 1946, we were waked at about 4 a. m. A Russian officer, three armed soldiers, and a female Russian interpreter entered our apartment in the Soviet section of Berlin, and told us that our factory would be removed to the Soviet Union and that we would be obliged to work in the Soviet Union for a tentative period of 5 years.

"We were given 30 minutes to evacuate and pack our entire three-room apartment, and when our packing didn't go fast enough the Russian soldiers began to pack things themselves. They tore the curtains from the windows, smashed open a wardrobe with an axe, and in general packed indiscriminately suits, dresses, dishes, pictures, etc., in rugs or other things which seemed to them useful for this purpose. My wife fainted and only came to again when I gave her water and laid her on a couch.

"I sought permission to leave my wife here, but it was not granted.

"We drove to the freight station at Koepenick. We were given a freight car for our furniture and an express-train compartment for ourselves.

"We waited all day for our departure. It was delayed till about 10 p. m., since new transports with the workers of the Oberspree Works and their families kept coming in constantly.

"Perhaps I should also add that early on October 21 the two directors of the factory, Dr. Steimel and Dr. Spiegel, were brought to Moscow by airplane ostensibly for conferences, and Mr. Grimm (divisional superintendent), Mr. Ziganke (laboratory superintendent), and Mr. Floer (engineer in Mr. Ziganke's laboratory), were also flown to Moscow to explain the work. The dependents of the above-named gentlemen were likewise loaded on the train on Tuesday.

WELL PROVISIONED

"When the sun went down we had to go to our compartment and keep the window shut—it couldn't be opened very far in any case. We were once again registered and at our departure received a food package. In this was food entirely of German origin with the following content: 3 pounds of bacon, 2 pounds of wurst, 5 pounds of onions, 5 pounds of sugar, 6 bars of chocolate, 5 kegs of canned meat, 1,200 cigarettes, 2 pieces of toilet soap, pepper, salt, etc. We were to be told the next day how long we had to make it last.

"While it was dark, I tried to open the door of the car with a skeleton key which I had providently brought along. I did not succeed, however, and it would probably have been foolish in any case to attempt a flight while still in Berlin, since the whole station area was surrounded and later also lit up. When the train was switched from one track to another a Russian soldier with fixed bayonet stood at the entrance of every car.

"After our departure from Berlin I succeeded in opening the connecting door to the next compartment. In the dark I then tried to open the door of the connecting platform and with some difficulty was able to open one side wide enough to creep through. Shortly after Erkner the train went a little more slowly, my wife and I left our compartment with two light handbags and succeeded in getting out on the step between the second and third cars. Since meanwhile the train had again put on speed we had to remain there till shortly before Fuerstenwalde before we found the courage to jump off."

BETWEEN THE LINES

Into this rather matter-of-fact account of the kidnaping of an entire factory, the seeing eye can read a world of meaning. Implied by it are the Soviet Union's technological weakness, the nature of Soviet rule in Germany, the character of life in a slave system, the advanced stage of the world armament race, the probability that in our time we shall see the means of life again transformed into the means of death.

But these things are disagreeable to think about. In this comfortable America we can leave the realities of the modern world to those so unfortunate as to have them brought forcibly to their attention.

REMOVAL OF FEDERAL EMPLOYEES FOR SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WHITE. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. I had risen earlier in the afternoon to make an insertion in the RECORD and inadvertently became involved in the debate. I did not intend to at all.

I now wish to make a brief explanation. Over the week end there has been considerable comment about the discharge of employees of the Federal Government who might be engaged in subversive activities. I have received numerous inquiries about a certain act which bears my name, which was cited as authority for that course. There can be no question, Mr. President, that subsections (1) and (2) of section 9A of what is commonly referred to as the Hatch Act do give ample authority for the procedure which has been announced, and in order that what they provide may be known generally, I send those particular sections to the desk and ask that the clerk read them so they may appear in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, and Senators will only need refer to the RECORD to find them.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the clerk will read as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9A. (1) It shall be unlawful for any person employed in any capacity by any agency of the Federal Government, whose compensation, or any part thereof, is paid from funds authorized or appropriated by any act of Congress, to have membership in any political party or organization which advocates the overthrow of our constitutional form of government in the United States.

(2) Any person violating the provisions of this section shall be immediately removed from the position or office held by him, and thereafter no part of the funds appropriated by any act of Congress for such position or office shall be used to pay the compensation of such person.

RECESS

Mr. WHITE. I move that the Senate stand in recess, in executive session, until tomorrow at 12 o'clock noon.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Does the motion for recess include the request that I may retain the floor?

Mr. WHITE. It does not prejudice the Senator in any respect.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa has the floor, in executive session, as the Senate recesses today.

The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 24 minutes p. m.) the Senate, in executive session, took a recess until tomorrow, Tuesday, March 25, 1947, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, MARCH 24, 1947

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, who willest us to rejoice and give thanks for all things, Thy majesty is inscrutable. The world calls today for work, hard work, whatever the cost may be; O constrain us to move forward with strong, active faith, and forgive any foolish word or frantic boast, for it is righteousness that exalteth a nation.

Eternal One, take us into the upper realms of aspiration, where temptation and selfish ambition will be subdued; preserve us from groundless fears and keep us humble, with minds hopeful and alert, seeking the very best for every section of our land. Grant us to treasure these moments to show forth statesmanship in which honor is honor and truth is truth and cannot be swerved from the paths of rectitude. O give us growing conviction of our high mission to our Republic, and enable us to be firm, calm, and courteous in the throes of uncertainty or thoughtless criticism. Thou Christ, whose brow never wore a frown, whose lips were full of grace, and whose hand was never given in infidelity, O keep us in fellowship with Thee, and Thine shall be the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, March 21, 1947, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 2157. An act to define and limit the jurisdiction of the courts to regulate actions arising under certain laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the foregoing bill, requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. WILEY, Mr. DONNELL, Mr. COOPER, Mr. EASTLAND, and Mr. MCGRATH to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. AUCHINCLOSS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. SARBACHER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an address by General Vandegrift, Commandant, United States Marine Corps.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include magazine articles in each.

Mr. LANDIS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. JONKMAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article by Mark Sullivan.

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include newspaper articles.

Mr. SHAFER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial appearing in the United States News.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. COLE of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Tuesday, March 25, at the conclusion of the legislative program of the day and following any special orders heretofore entered, I be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

BORAH MEMORIAL STATUE COMMISSION

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I call up Senate Concurrent Resolution 8 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the concurrent resolution.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Borah Memorial Statue Commission of Idaho is hereby authorized to place temporarily in the rotunda of the Capitol a statue of the late William E. Borah, of Idaho, and to hold ceremonies in the rotunda on said occasion; and the Architect of the Capitol is hereby authorized to make the necessary arrangements therefor.

The Senate concurrent resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. JONKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks, and include a radio address.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

[Mr. JONKMAN addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

[Mr. SHAFER addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

COMMUNISM IN THE GOVERNMENT

Mr. MATHEWS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. MATHEWS. Mr. Speaker, I asked a man who has been employed by the Government for many years, not in the State Department, what he thought about the President's plan laid down in his speech of March 12, and he said he thought it was a piece of political propaganda to counteract the unfavorable reaction of the American people to the secret agreements made by President Roosevelt at Yalta and elsewhere with Russia and our appeasement policy toward that nation in the UNO. He gave as proof of the fact that although the President on March 12 asked us to combat communism in foreign lands, only over this week end did he announce that he would combat it in his own administration, and the further fact that the people who are now loudest in denouncing communism but a short time before were its most ardent friends and protectors.

I will bring you these answers from day to day, Mr. Speaker.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

[Mr. POULSON addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. POULSON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include a table.

Mr. BUCK asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an address by A. G. Lanston.

Mr. DONDERO asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a telegram from the American Federation of Labor.

Mr. PRICE of Illinois asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include in each an editorial.

Mr. MEADE of Maryland asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a radio address delivered yesterday.

REMOVAL OF SUBVERSIVE PERSONS FROM GOVERNMENT SERVICE

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Speaker, the Republican Party has been contending for years that subversive persons occupy many high and low places in the Government service. As a Republican, I am delighted that President Truman has seen the light and has taken positive steps to eliminate these enemies of our country from the Federal pay roll. The pity is that the job was not done a dozen years ago.

SUBVERSIVE PERSONS

Mr. CHELF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHELF. Mr. Speaker, I first want to commend the President of the United States for his recent Executive Order No. 9300, which will rid all the departments of the United States Government of disloyal and subversive persons. I think the President has done a magnificent job, but unfortunately he has not been able to go far enough. He needs legislation. I know every Member of Congress wants the President's sweeping order to actually sweep out these termites in our Government, and as a member of the subcommittee on Immigration and Naturalization of the Judiciary Committee, I have today introduced a bill which will not only revoke and set aside the citizenship of all those who have been found by the loyalty boards to be subversive and disloyal to this country, but authorizes the Attorney General in the Department of Justice to immediately deport those termites from the United States. If they are dangerous to our Government here as persons on the pay roll, by the same token they are dangerous as citizens or residents and should be denied citizenship and refuge here. They should be sent back on the next boat to the country from whence they came or to the country whose cause they espoused or advocated. To bite the hand that feeds is one thing—but to chew off the arm is another. Folks down in my country have a way of disposing of vicious dogs who bite—let us apply that rule here by deportation—because such action will rid us of all those who would seek to desecrate our flag and to destroy our American institutions of Christianity and democracy.

THE DRIVE AGAINST COMMUNISM

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, in the drive against communism, the President has issued an order to investigate the loyalty of all of those in the executive department of the Government. While we heartily approve this step, we fervently wish that it had been taken many years ago. But this investigation is to extend only to all of those in the various agencies of the executive department. The order did not cover the legislative and judicial branches of the Government. I feel that no department ought to be exempt. The order will serve as a protection to the loyal persons in all branches. It is true that the executive department does not control the hiring and firing of all those in the legislative and judicial departments, but any disloyalty to our Nation found in any department should be disclosed and made public and the publicity itself, in most cases, would force the retirement of any disloyal persons. I hope very much therefore that the President will exempt nobody in the entire Government in the sweeping investigation. If any person of this entire Government entertains Communist views or belongs to any Communist-front organization, the facts ought to be made known. If we are to embark upon the plan to combat communism in other parts of the world, we should use every means at our command to stamp out and destroy communism here at home.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

[Mr. BELL addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

TAX BILL H. R. 1

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have until midnight tonight to file minority views on tax bill, H. R. 1.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have until midnight tonight to file a report on the tax bill, H. R. 1.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. KNUTSON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and insert a letter and an article.

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. WILLIAMS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in connection with the speech which I will make in Committee of the Whole this afternoon and include certain letters.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

PRIVATE DINING ROOM FOR MEMBERS

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce to the House that the service pantry for the Members' private dining room is now in operation. Therefore, the doors to this room on the main corridor have been locked and the entrance to this room is now through the rear door in the back corridor near the rear stairway. This dining room is for the Members of the House only. All Members are requested to please cooperate in keeping this dining room for the exclusive use of Members, and to that end it is respectfully requested and suggested that the Members not take guests into that dining room.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that tomorrow, after the disposition of business on the Speaker's desk and the conclusion of special orders heretofore granted, I may address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD relative to the boxcar shortage and also include a copy of a telegram.

Mr. ANGELL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a statement by Mr. Jacobsen, general manager of the Northwest Nut Growers.

PERMISSION TO EXTEND REMARKS AT THIS POINT

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, on January 3 our newly elected Speaker stated as part of the remarks he made from the Speaker's rostrum that he proposed to eliminate from the Federal pay roll all Communists and other members of subversive organizations. This declaration was applauded from one end of the country to the other, and I am sure the Speaker's promise will be kept.

Last Saturday the President announced that all Federal employees, as well as those who will become Federal employees in the future, are to be given a loyalty test. This Executive order indicated that membership in certain unknown organizations would be considered as proof of disloyalty and that such employees would be discharged from the Federal service. While I want to see every disloyal employee discharged from the Government service, we do not want witchhunting going on in every department.

I am also at a loss to understand why employees of the legislative and judicial branches of our Government should be exempt from such a loyalty test. Regardless of the exemption allowed by the President, I here and now invite the FBI or any other proper agency of the Government to check on the loyalty of every person employed in my office, myself included.

ELIMINATION OF COMMUNISTS FROM THE GOVERNMENT SERVICE

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I trust the Congress will receive with the greatest caution the proposal of the President for an appropriation of $25,000,000 for a program to weed from the Government pay roll those persons with membership, affiliation, or sympathetic association in any foreign or domestic organization, association, movement, and so forth, designated by the Attorney General as totalitarian, Fascist, Communist, or subversive, or those seeking to alter the form of government of the United States by unconstitutional means. This may well involve considerably more than appears on the surface.

In the first place it strikes one rather strangely that the New Deal forces controlling the Government should so suddenly become concerned over those favoring totalitarianism and communism in the Government as to cause it to undertake such drastic action.

Has not one of the main characteristics of the New Deal been to pamper and encourage the development of these very elements? If the President's order includes all those in the Government who have more faith in the Russian system than that provided by the Constitution of our fathers, and his order actually should be carried out, Washington will be almost depopulated.

This proposal has some aspects of being a New Deal witch hunt to eliminate the forces that oppose it in order to strengthen and make secure its totalitarian hold upon the Nation, in the guise of ridding it of Communist adherents. Is it expected that this purge would be confined to Federal employees? Or would it also embrace other persons who do not see eye to eye with the New Deal?

Is this the beginning of a purge of the recusants to destroy the two-party system? Could the intention be to prepare the Nation for another war? Is the concentration camp in sight?

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

[Mr. MILLER of Nebraska addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. KEATING asked and was granted permission to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD with reference to a bill he is introducing today at the request of the American Legion.

Mr. MERROW asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mrs. ST. GEORGE asked and was granted permission to extend her remarks in the RECORD and include a letter.

TERM OF PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, a number of inquiries are coming in as to when the proposed constitutional amendment limiting the term of the Presidency will reach the States. The enrolled bill is now on the Speaker's desk, and I understand will be signed by the Speaker today.

The SPEAKER. It has already been signed.

Mr. MICHENER. I thank the Speaker. I understand it will also be signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate today. The State Department advises me that the work has already been done and that the amendment will go forward from the State Department to the Governors of the several States just as soon as it is received at the State Department. The next step is consideration by the State legislatures. It is to be hoped that speedy action will be taken.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE OF THE HOUSE

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of the privilege of the House and I offer a resolution (H. Res. 160) which I send to the Clerk's desk, and move its adoption.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas under Public Law No. 601 of the Seventy-ninth Congress, the so-called Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, there was created a standing committee of the House of Representatives to be known as Committee on Un-American Activities and to consist of nine members; and the House, on January 3, 1947, by House Resolution 5, adopted all applicable provisions of said Public Law No. 601; and

Whereas the members to serve as said committee were appointed, and the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. THOMAS, is chairman of said committee and a member thereof; and the gentleman from South Dakota, Mr. MUNDT; the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. MCDOWELL; the gentleman from California, Mr. NIXON; the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. VAIL; the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. WOOD; the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. RANKIN; the gentleman from Florida, Mr. PETERSON; and the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. BONNER, are members of said committee and Members of the House; and

Whereas on the 17th day of March 1947, the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. SABATH, speaking from the well of the House, made certain remarks set forth in the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date on page 2219, to which the attention of the Speaker and the House is most respectfully called but which are not herein repeated; and

Whereas the language printed in the last paragraph of the left column on page 2219 of the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD reflects upon the integrity and patriotism of a Member of the House in his representative capacity; and

Whereas an examination of the proceedings of the House, as printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on March 17, 1947, discloses that the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. SABATH, had reference to certain remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. RANKIN, as printed in the first column of page 2142 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; and

Whereas, it appears from an examination of the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. RANKIN, that the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. SABATH, as above referred to and as printed in the last paragraph of the left column on page 2219 of the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, are not in accord with the fact; and

Whereas the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. SABATH, further stated, and there is printed on page 2219 of the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 17, 1947, in the middle column, the words:

"For 8 years the Dies committee and its successor, the standing Committee on Un-American Propaganda Activities, of which the gentleman has been a member for over 2 years, together with several other committees of the House and with a lot of other little understudies for Mr. Dies, have probed and smeared and made public charges against all these alleged Communist or pro-Communist organizations, but they have actually succeeded only in branding some patriotic Americans with the charge of communism, and of gaining some newspaper convictions of others on vague charges of communicating with the Communists. Not one has yet seen fit to penetrate and expose the real dangers to our democratic way of life from powerful Fascist-minded men armed with vast wealth and industrial resources;" and

Whereas such charges as so stated reflect upon the patriotism, the loyalty, of the members of said committee as members of said committee and as representatives of the people, acting in their representative capacity; and

Whereas the words above quoted make the unequivocal and direct charge that a standing committee of the House and its members have made false public charges against alleged Communists or pro-Communist organizations and that said committee has, and its members have, falsely accused some patriotic Americans with a charge of communism, and makes the further charge that said committee has neglected and failed in its legislative duty, and that members of said committee are guilty of the same fault and dereliction; and

Whereas the statements of the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. SABATH, tend to undermine the confidence of the people in the House of Representatives and in one of its standing committees: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. SABATH, as printed on page 2219 of the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD be, and the same hereby are, stricken from the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, a word of explanation is due those Members who are here for the first time.

Perhaps some of the new Members may wonder why objection was made to the unanimous-consent request submitted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] on Friday evening. Perhaps a word of explanation is also due because of the statement made a few moments ago by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX], for whom I have the highest respect.

Before proceeding to discuss this resolution let me say that on several occasions in the past, not one but several, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] has not only made attacks upon Members of Congress but upon Committees of the Congress, reflecting upon the patriotism of Members of the Congress, their integrity in their legislative capacity, reflecting upon the actions of the duly appointed special and standing committees of this House. I agree with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX] that we should exercise the utmost charity before attempting as a body to criticize any Member of the House for what is said on the floor.

I recall very distinctly in the early years of my service here when a Member of the House put in the RECORD false affidavits and from the floor accused Members of the House of disloyalty and unpatriotic action. I recall very distinctly that at that time it was announced by me that I intended to move to strike those affidavits from the RECORD. I talked with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX], and it was agreed that if that resolution was not presented the Committee on Rules would take care of the situation by proper resolution. Later it was agreed that the remarks should, by unanimous consent, be stricken from the RECORD, and they were so stricken and that was the end of that.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. I wish to say to the gentleman from Michigan that I have sent for and got the stenographic notes and as to the matter of the statements slandering me that appeared in the RECORD, I find most of it was not uttered on the floor but was written by someone else. It was, therefore, in violation of the rules of the House and of all other rules of common decency.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Of course, the rule of the House is violated where some statement of that kind is written in the RECORD and not made on the floor. But I hold no brief for the gentleman from Mississippi and am not concerned at the moment in the disagreement between the two gentlemen on my right. The gentleman from Mississippi needs no defense from me or from anyone else. He has served the people of his district, I think, for some 30 years—how many is it?

Mr. RANKIN. Twenty-six.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Well, I am 4 short. It will be 34 years from this day.

They have been satisfied, and I doubt if there is any Member of this body who will question either his ability, his sincerity, his loyalty and patriotism, or his competency to serve, and I say that notwithstanding the statements which have been made by the gentleman from New York, Mr. WINCHELL, and perhaps the gentleman from Washington, Mr. PEARSON.

So, to come back to this resolution and what has preceded it. On February 27—now, get that date—1946, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH]—and I have here the RECORD—on the floor of this House attacked the Dies committee. That was not the first time. The gentleman from Illinois, who sits in front of me [Mr. MASON], has been on that committee, and other Members have served on that committee with honor and distinction, and the service rendered by them has been invaluable, as is evidenced by the fact that the President within the week has seen fit to adopt and to follow the course which that committee, under the guidance of Mr. Dies, recommended eight long years ago with reference to the Communists and disclosed the way in which they have been taken in and carried on the Federal pay roll. The gentleman from Illinois on the 27th of February 1946 made that attack upon that committee. At that time I had a resolution ready to strike, and so again then the gentleman asked unanimous consent to withdraw his remarks. The consent was given, and he withdrew his remarks, and in withdrawing them he repeated the charge in the so-called apology which he made to the House at that time. He referred to the demand of the gentleman from Mississippi that they be withdrawn as being unfair.

How long are we to follow this policy of letting Members of Congress, of letting committees of Congress, be charged with disloyalty, with a lack of integrity, with improper and unlawful activities, charges not made on the floor of the House but inserted in the RECORD, and then permit the one making the charge to come in at the close of the session when no one is here, and without apology ask that the offending words be withdrawn. Let us take this hypothetical case. I charge you gentlemen with all sorts of misconduct, and the Daily Worker and the Communist press and the left-wingers throughout the country pick it up and repeat it, work up publicity, and send it out to your districts, and then I come in at night, when there are only four or five Members on the floor, or I come in a week later and I say, "I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to withdraw the remarks I made on such a date" or "printed at such and such a page." Are we going to stand for that, I ask?

The Members of the House, of course, can do as each may wish; but there is no doubt as to the meaning, the import of the charge made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH]. There is no doubt, if you examine the RECORD, but that that charge has been made by him over the years, for the last 6 or 7 years, practically ever since the Dies committee began its work right down to the present moment, repeated time and again.

Gentlemen, if the House wants to yield its dignity, its integrity, so that the confidence of the people in it will be destroyed, that is within the power of the House, but I say unanimous consent should be denied until the gentleman gets on the floor and apologizes in the proper way and gives promise and assurance to the House that he does not intend to continue that course of conduct.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman has failed to read the different statements that have been made by the gentleman from Mississippi and myself. But I do not object to that. However, I wonder whether the gentleman has read the following that I said:

> I agree with the gentleman that we should discharge all Communists in the State and Justice Departments or anywhere else if such there be. Personally, I would go a step further than the gentleman and fire every man or woman whose first and only loyalty is not to the United States.

That is in the speech I made.

Mr. HOFFMAN. There you are. I say to the Members of this House, there is an illustration of just the course the gentleman has followed throughout the years. He apologizes and he attempts to justify. What is he justifying? Those few words? No, he is talking about his speech, and he is attempting to argue that his speech is all right. That is just what he did in February of 1946, a little more than a year ago.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. I am not combating what the gentleman says nor am I resisting his resolution. I simply wish to make this inquiry: Would the gentleman and others so deeply concerned be satisfied if the gentleman from Illinois were given the opportunity to offer apologies and to submit a request for unanimous consent to take the speech out of the RECORD?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. If the gentleman from Georgia had consulted me before he entered this controversy, I could have given him some information. In the first place, the statement that was put in the RECORD by the Member from Illinois was not uttered on the floor of the House; but it was written, I am informed, by a man named Buckles in the Member's office. I have Buckles' record of smearing the Congress of the United States and of his alinement with subversive organizations and individuals. He seems to have put in the last few years maligning and abusing the Congress of the United States, individual Members of Congress, and other patriotic Americans. For that reason, I sent for and got the stenographic notes, and they are not what appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Therefore, since this man Buckles has been maligning Members of Congress and other patriotic Americans, I think it is about time we come to a showdown. For that reason, I am going to support the gentleman's motion to strike this entire statement from the RECORD.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RANKIN) there were—ayes 152, noes 0.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, this is so important that I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seventy-six Members are present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 324, nays 1, answered "present" 1, not voting 106, as follows:

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a radio speech.

Mr. NORBLAD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. VURSELL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances, and in one to include a speech delivered by Colonel McCormick at Los Angeles, Calif.

Mr. WOLVERTON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a memorandum on the British nationalization of transport bill by Dr. C. S. Duncan, economist of the Association of American Railroads.

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in five instances and include excerpts.

Mr. RAINS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a statement by Mr. Donald Comer, of Alabama.

Mr. BUCHANAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include two editorials, one from the Pittsburgh Press and the other from the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette.

COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House Committee on Banking and Currency may sit this afternoon notwithstanding the fact that the House may be in session.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT OF SETTLEMENT OF MEXICAN CLAIMS ACT

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 27) amending the Settlement of Mexican Claims Act of 1942 to provide for the consideration of any claim decided by the General Claims Commission in which the United States filed a petition for rehearing.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Settlement of Mexican Claims Act of 1942, approved December 18, 1942, be amended by adding after section 3 (a), paragraph (6) thereof, the following paragraph:

"(7) Any claim decided by the General Claims Commission in which the United States filed a petition for rehearing."

Mr. MANSFIELD of Texas. Mr. Speaker, this is a claim of the North American Dredging Co. of Texas against the Mexican Government. It was for dredging done many years ago on the harbor of Salina Cruz on the western coast of Mexico. There have been three or four Mexican Claims Commissions preceding this one now functioning and the present Commission will cease to function after April 4, in accordance with the terms of the treaty. This claim has been presented to previous commissions, but never came to a hearing. They all terminated before reaching this claim, except one and then the claim was dismissed on a technicality. Consequently it has never been considered on its merits. The purpose of this resolution is to give the present Commission authority to act upon it and either approve it or disapprove the claim in whole or in part. It cannot wait for the regular day for taking up the Consent Calendar as the Commission will have gone out of existence before that time. They have given us the assurance that if it can be presented to them at once, they will have time to consider it before April 4, the last day of the existence of the present Commission. The adoption of the resolution does not cost the Federal Government anything, neither does it say whether or not the claim shall be approved or disapproved. It merely gives the Claims Commission authority to take such action as the facts warrant.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 48) was laid on the table.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR-FEDERAL SECURITY APPROPRIATION BILL, 1948

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2700) making appropriations for the Department of Labor, the Federal Security Agency, and related independent agencies, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1948, and for other purposes; and pending that motion, I wonder if an agreement can be reached as to the time for general debate on this bill.

I have a suggestion to make, Mr. Speaker. I understand the majority conference is to be held in this room at 4 o'clock this afternoon. Obviously that will not give sufficient time to consider this appropriation measure adequately. I suggest therefore that in the event general debate is not concluded by 4 o'clock this afternoon we resume general debate tomorrow morning at 11 o'clock for an hour and a half, and then commence to read the bill.

Mr. ROONEY. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, there is merit in the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin that we proceed with general debate tomorrow morning at 11 o'clock, but I suggest that we determine the time for general debate in view of the situation then.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, do I correctly understand that those who plan to attend the majority conference this afternoon may arrange their affairs so as to be here at 4 o'clock?

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests to the gentleman from Wisconsin that it would be better to limit his request to the time for general debate tomorrow, the time to be equally divided, and later in the day the majority leader can ask unanimous consent that the House meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. KEEFE. Yes.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin move that the Committee rise at 4 o'clock this afternoon?

Mr. KEEFE. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin state his request again for the information of the House?

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, my motion is that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of this bill, and pending that motion I ask unanimous consent that general debate continue today until 4 o'clock, and that in the event we have not concluded at 4 o'clock we have 1 hour and a half of general debate tomorrow, the House if possible to meet at 11 o'clock.

Mr. ROONEY. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, would it not be better if we were to run on until 4 o'clock and then see what the situation is tomorrow? We might otherwise be cutting off a number of those who would wish to make remarks and engage in the debate on this important bill making funds available for the Department of Labor and the Federal Security Agency. We probably can agree on that tomorrow morning.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, I am making this request because of what I understand the legislative program of the leadership of the House to be, and rather than to get into any argument tomorrow as to an extension of time for general debate, I have made the request so that we might pass this bill tomorrow. So far as I am personally concerned, I have no particular wish in the matter, but that seems to be in line with the intent of the leadership of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. ROONEY. I object.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that on the adoption of the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union that there will be 1 hour for general debate for each side?

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, whoever is first recognized is entitled to 1 hour and, of course, the Member can yield such portions of that time as he wishes.

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, perhaps we could agree with the gentleman from Wisconsin as to the time. I note that there are 2 hours and 40 minutes left and perhaps it is possible at this point to agree to divide that time.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman withdraws his objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin he can come to some agreement on the time.

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, is it understood that the minority is to have an equal division of the time for debate this afternoon?

The SPEAKER. After the first hour has been used by the majority, the minority then can have 1 hour under the rule.

Mr. ROONEY. That is agreeable.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE].

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 2700, with Mr. HOPE in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 30 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, the bill which is now before us makes appropriations for the Department of Labor, the Federal Security Agency, and certain related independent agencies of Government. It is a very complicated bill and very difficult to understand all of its provisions. It provides for appropriations totaling about one-billion-six-hundred-odd-million dollars.

I want to discuss first the appropriations for the Department of Labor, about which there has been some considerable discussion in the newspapers and over the radio recently. Many of these remarks that you have heard over the radio and much of the editorial comment with respect to the action of this committee has been made completely in ignorance of the true facts of the situation.

Generally speaking, the Department of Labor is divided into certain specific elements, for purposes of appropriation. For example, the first appropriation which you will find in reading this bill and the report relates to the Office of the Secretary. Included in the over-all heading, "Office of the Secretary," is the Solicitor's office, contingent expenses, traveling expenses, printing and binding for the whole agency. Then, in addition, there are penalty-mail costs, Division of Labor Standards, and Conciliation Service. That is all incorporated, for the purpose of appropriation, in the office of the Secretary. And I want to discuss that appropriation for just a few moments.

That office is headed by the Secretary of Labor. See what a wonderful outfit they have developed down there, largely because the Congress has given them authority to go ahead and develop it. Sitting up here is the Secretary af Labor. Under him is the Under Secretary of Labor. Next in line are three Assistant Secretaries of Labor, and next in line are three assistants to the Assistant Secretaries of Labor, and then, following on down, appear the division chiefs and division heads of agencies and so on. So that the head of a division in the Department of Labor in order to reach the Secretary of Labor himself has to go through an assistant secretary to the Assistant Secretary, then the Assistant Secretary, then the Under Secretary before he can even ever reach the Secretary of Labor. It is the greatest administrative set-up you have ever seen to provide lush jobs at $10,000 a year, and offers the finest opportunity for the repayment of political preference that you have ever seen, in order to take care of job holders at $10,000 a year. The former Governor of Kentucky, Mr. Johnson, occupies the job of Under Secretary of Labor.

Mr. REES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. Pardon me. I cannot yield now. The time has been very restricted by action of the gentleman on my right.

The situation is simply this: Supposedly, here is a little department. They call it a little department because its appropriation, over-all, is only about $103,000,000; and $71,000,000 of that represents funds allocated to the States for the Employment Service. But it has this big over-all, top-heavy administration set-up down there. That is their business. The last Congress provided it and the people of the United States are paying for it, believe me.

Now, we went into that situation a little bit and we made a cut. We said, "Over-all you are going to get along with salaries in that office that you had before." And I think we are treating them mighty well. If you will turn to page 40 at the back of the report, you can follow this through. The Secretary's office had $968,648,000 in 1947. We recommended $819,500,000 for the next fiscal year, and it is plenty.

We have cut the Solicitor's office in line with cuts that have been made in other parts of the Department. We have cut their contingent expenses and their travel expenses, and we have cut their printing and binding expenses and penalty-mail costs—all in line with the general cuts that have been made throughout the entire bill.

Then, we finally come to this Division of Labor Standards that many of you have heard so much about. I wish I had a couple of hours to talk to you about the Division of Labor Standards, but I only have a few minutes. Let me say to you the Division of Labor Standards was created not by an act of Congress of the United States. It was a little division set up in the Department of Labor by Miss Perkins when she became Secretary of Labor, by administrative order. I think you should know a little bit about this Division of Labor Standards, because we have not made any appropriation for it at all.

When the Children's Bureau was transferred to the Federal Security Agency, there was left in the Department of Labor the functions relating to child labor and child welfare enforcement.

A sum of money was left to the Department of Labor to carry on that function. The Secretary administratively transferred that function to the Division of Labor Standards.

Then they have a little outfit called the Division of Labor Education for which Mr. Gibson, one of the Assistant Secretaries got $34,000 from us last year. Then they spent $13,000 and they set up a little outfit in the Division of Labor Standards to educate labor and to equip seminars and to equip universities to set up courses, and so on and so forth, $63,000.

What we did was to take these child-labor functions and transfer them to the Wage and Hour Division; and we took the labor education functions office and transferred it to the Bureau of Labor Statistics; and let me tell you what a good thing it is.

Now, the Labor Department itself, nor the Secretary, nor anybody down there, does not offer any serious objection to the transfer of the child-labor functions to the Wage and Hour Division. Nobody could offer objections to that. That is a step in the right direction. Why? Because for years the Wage and Hour Division has handled the complete problem of child-labor violation and prosecution and study and everything relating to all plants in the United States operating under Walsh-Healey contracts, and as to those not operating under Walsh-Healey contracts they did the investigating work through their inspection staff and then funneled their reports back into the Children's Bureau when it was in the Department of Labor.

All we are saying is that the Wage and Hour Division has the functional capacity to handle this whole problem involving plants operating under Walsh-Healey contracts. It has the ability to do it in the entire civilian production of the country. So we transferred that over to the Wage and Hour Division and we are saving about $150,000. The work will be done, and Mr. Walling's department should do that job. The Secretary of Labor himself said he proposed to have it transferred there as of March 1 and that the only reason he did not put it there in the beginning was because Mr. Walling's outfit was up in New York, but they expected them back here and they expected to make the change. Well, the committee decided to make sure the change was made, and they did this at a saving of about $150,000.

The other thing that was in this Division of Labor Standards was the publication of little booklets relating to safety and sanitation and labor's rights and how to bargain collectively, and this, that, and the other.

Mr. Chairman, if you will read this record you will see that in that field there is a complete overlapping, despite all of the contrary talk that you may hear coming from this side. All you have got to do is to take this book I hold in my hand and read it and see what is in it. This is a book that is published by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. It is entitled: "Union Agreement Provisions." We went over this in the committee, and with the two supplements that they are going to put in their new book which I have here they completely cover the entire program of the printing of pamphlets by the Division of Labor Standards. They cover the whole field, and it is here in a well-written instrument that the committee thoroughly has approved of; but we cannot see any reason why the Division of Labor Standards should be taking material from these pamphlets and reprinting it in separate pamphlets of their own and taking credit for doing that sort of thing.

In the matter of safety and sanitation in the plants of America the Division of Labor Standards used to tell us the field was important and what a grand job they were doing. They had only about three people, and for years I have asked the Secretary of Labor to have these agents of the Wage and Hour Division, the three-hundred-odd inspectors that they have, called in to seminars and have them trained as trained safety factory inspectors to cooperate with the State factory inspectors and thus get some real safety into the picture, because safety is a State matter and the Federal Government cannot do anything about it except to make suggestions and say we want that matter built up in the States, and we want the agency that has the force that goes into the States and goes into the plants train those men in the simple minimum standards of safety and sanitation, not that they would be able to make an enforceable order but merely to cooperate with the State agencies and to offer suggestions.

If we are going to save any money any place we have got to begin to cut down. Here you are going to have an opportunity to cut down, to get rid of the first agency of government since I have been here, that is, the Division of Labor Standards, but not to do away with all of its functions. We put it in other places in the Department of Labor, as I have indicated.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Will the gentleman call to the attention of the House the fact that this is simply an administrative agency and was never set up by statute?

Mr. KEEFE. I have said that; that this outfit was not set up by any act of Congress. It is a mere administrative agency.

Now, we come to the next one, the Conciliation Service. I want to spend a little time on that. There have been a lot of misstatements in the paper and over the radio, and a lot of people talking who do not know what they are talking about. Let me just indicate to you how things develop, to lay a little background.

I had a man come to my office Saturday afternoon, a very fine citizen of Chicago, who was a member of the Sixth Regional War Labor Board, that a fellow by the name of Warren used to be the head of. This man's name is W. Homer Harts, president, Morgan Frog & Crossing Works, who with a number of other men signed the statement in the paper telling what a great man this Warren is who is involved in this Conciliation Service business.

Well, sir, you know, that reminded me of the last case I tried before I came to Congress, when I was appointed by the Governor to prosecute a big arson case. The defendant in the trial of that case put on the witness stand the president of his company and all his business associates and everybody else, and they all testified what a wonderful man he was, but before that case concluded, in the presence of all his friends, neighbors, preachers, bankers, and business associates, he stood up in that courtrom and said, "Your Honor, I ask leave to withdraw my previous plea of not guilty and enter a plea of guilty," and that night he took strychnine and committed suicide, all of this evidence concerning his great character to the contrary notwithstanding.

So, this gentleman came to me. He read something in the paper and he said, "I did not know about these things that are being said now when I signed this. A fellow came out to Chicago from the Conciliation Service with the statement already prepared and asked if I would sign it. He said, 'So-and-so has agreed to sign it. Will you sign it?' And just as a matter of course, without thinking, I signed it." I said, "When you signed it, did you know the facts?" He said, "I didn't know anything except that this man was out there during this short period of time and he had a good job." I said, "Let me read you the record." And I read the record to him and it is here for you to read, and you ought to read it. You will find it starting on page 662 of the hearing.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Warren, were you at any time an economist with the Wage and Hour Division of the Department of Labor?

Mr. WARREN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEEFE. Did you live at 103 George Mason Drive, Arlington, Va.?

Mr. WARREN. I did.

I asked him those questions. Why? Because I never knew Mr. Warren. I knew nothing of his background or anything about him. I had sent to the Committee on Un-American Activities for a list of all persons that showed they were employed by the Labor Department and had any subversive background, and I found this name, E. L. Warren, residing at 103 George Mason Drive, Arlington, and I did not know whether that was Edgar L. Warren or who it was. So I asked him these questions.

Mr. KEEFE. At that time, when you were an economist in the Wage and Hour Division of the Department of Labor, were you a member of the American League for Peace and Democracy?

Mr. WARREN. I was a member of that organization at one time, probably at that time; yes.

Mr. KEEFE. Were you a member of the Washington Book Shop?

Mr. WARREN. I was.

I have since found out he was not only a member but he was a director of the Washington Book Shop. Now, those organizations were two of the foremost, outstanding Communist organizations here in Washington. "Well," he said, "I do not hold that radical philosophy any longer," if you read the record. "I do not believe that way any more," and yet at last year's hearings I questioned him before the committee with respect to a statement which he made in a seminar down here in an interdepartmental seminar of employes in which he took the position that he approved the philosophy of the right of Federal employees striking against the Government, and under his own statement that was in the autumn of 1945. You will find it on page 146 of these hearings of last year.

So this gentleman who now says that he does not believe these philosophies of radicalism any more, he quit when he found out that there were Communists in those organizations, as late as the fall of 1945 he is the head of the Conciliation Service, is advocating the right of Federal employees to strike against the Government, and then when I asked him about that he said, "Oh, I do not believe that any more." And I said, "Why not?" "Why," he said, "I have been reading and thinking and I have changed my mind now; I do not believe in it any more." I said, "When did you change your mind? When did you disavow that philosophy? Have you ever publicly disavowed it?" And he said the only disavowal was when he disavowed at the time I questioned him before this committee, and he was caught.

My position in this matter is simply this. I have been one of the friends of the Conciliation Service, and my record is clear. I have been one of those who have fought for the Conciliation Service, as every Member of the House knows. We gave them every dollar of money they needed when John Steelman was the head of it. But we have a different situation down there right now. Let me tell you about it. This is characteristic of a lot of this Government stuff that I will not have time to talk about.

When we set up this Conciliation Service originally we provided that as far as the departmental service was concerned that would be subject to Civil Service, but as to the field, we said to John Steelman, "You go out and hire the best men you can hire without regard to Civil Service limitations." He did, and we supported him. So they always made their presentation before this committee on the basis of a departmental appropriation and a field appropriation.

Along comes Warren. He thinks John Steelman's method of having conciliation work out in the field in the grass roots where the conciliators did the work is crazy. He is building up a great big department here in Washington with a lot of so-called experts that can go out into a plant and tell the mannfacturer what is wrong, that he ought to have another assembly line here, "You are spending too much time on this operation and that operation. We can show you where you can save some money and thus pay more money to these people." It is no longer a conciliation service. That is what he is doing, and he is wrecking the Conciliation Service that John Steelman set up, despite anything that anybody may say.

What did he do? In order to build up this departmental service he had to have money, so he fired 39 of the grassroots conciliators. Some of those conciliators had excellent records right at the time they were fired. He used that money from out in the field to build up his departmental service here at Washington. He brought people into the department without any compliance with civil-service requirements, and he did it through fraud, by setting out a jobsheet certificate that these people were appointed as commissioners of conciliation, when he knew, as he admitted, that not one of them would perform any of the functions of a field conciliator.

When I go down to his department and say, "What about this man here, Mr. Warren, this Gordon Cole that you appointed on August 12, 1946, at a salary of $7,102.20? He is appointed as a conciliation commissioner. Let me see his job sheet, let me see his civil-service job sheet." He does not have any. Why? Because he is fooling you and fooling me when he puts that guy on the pay roll and says that he is a commissioner of conciliation, when he knew that man was never going to perform any of the services of a conciliator.

The committee, or a majority of the committee, has designated that conduct as fraud, a fraud not only upon the 39 commissioners that he fired but a fraud on the Congress of the United States, and certainly a fraud upon the committee that gave him his money.

That is not all. There are a lot of other things that this fellow has been doing down there. As far as this committee is concerned, the chairman submitted the whole situation to the Secretary of Labor in advance, in hope that this man could be gotten rid of before we even had to consider his appropriation. The matter was taken right up to the White House. We have done everything we can to lay this bird's record right out there cold.

As far as this committee is concerned, what it has said is twofold. First, there are plenty of real Americans left in this country with no background of affiliation with Communist outfits that can handle that job and do it well. There are plenty of Americans that believe in America and have never associated with these Communist radicals that can do that job. We do not propose, if it lies within our power, to see this man kept by the taxes that come from our people. We can successfully prevent it here if you will stand with us. You will have an opportunity now to show whether you meant what you said when you told your people that you are going to throw out the first Communist that gets in your way. My friend, Mr. ROONEY, can stand up here and tell how anti-Communist he is and how they all hate him up in New York and how his name and his religion any everything else would belie the fact that he could see anything good about a Communist. He has made such statements. I understand he will make them here again today in support of this man Warren. He will say that this man Warren is a wonderful man. He will say, "I have letters here from so-and-so and so-and-so and so-and-so—from the chamber of commerce and from the Nation Manufacturers Association." How they do use the National Association of Manufacturers when they want to use them and how they dam them almost every other time.

I can bring in a stack of letter that high from people who say that this man has wrecked the Conciliation Service. I am not relying upon that, however. I am relying upon the record. If Mr. Warren had any statement to make, look at the record. The record is here. He had a chance. He had every chance. We brought him before the committee twice. I want to tell you as a friend of the Conciliation Service and as one who wants to see that service carried on that you do not have to worry about the fact that we have gotten rid of a whole flock of $10,000-a-year men and have also gotten rid of a lot of these so-called regional offices. In one of these regional offices they had three conciliators working. They had a regional director, a special regional director, and a branch regional director. You never saw such a bunch of $10,000-a-year lush jobs in all your life. No wonder they are scurrying up and down the land trying to hold on to that kind of stuff.

But I am telling you that as long as I have anything to say about it, they are going to go. If you are going to achieve any reduction in public expenditures, here is your chance to demonstrate what you want to do. I know you will do that, and I know you will have confidence in the committee that has brought you this bill.

The Conciliation Service will not be hurt a bit. Your real fellows out in the field are all there. The offices are all provided for. We have left one branch supervisor in each of the offices and we have left the stenographic help to take care of the offices. We have left the conciliators that they have said were necessary to do the job, which is a very much reduced job.

Mr. BUSBEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield.

Mr. BUSBEY. I think the applause of the Members a few moments ago demonstrates our appreciation of the fine work the chairman of this subcommittee has done on this particular department and the very intelligent statement he has made regarding this situation. I think that the gentlemen would also like to know that the gentleman he referred to a moment ago, Mr. Homer Harz, of Chicago, who interviewed him in his office Saturday afternoon, has gone back to Chicago to call together at a luncheon today these various men who signed that statement with him and explain to them how they were sucked in by this emissary of Mr. Warren's down here and that somebody's face will be red, I am sure.

Mr. KEEFE. I think before this bill has been concluded many faces will be red in connection with this episode because we are checking up on this fellow Warren spending your money and mine to send his emissaries throughout the country to get these letters that my friend on the other side will wave in front of you in a short time. It is easy to get people to sign petitions. It is easy to get them to sign letters. But Mr. Warren had an opportunity to make some statements of that kind before the committee when he could be examined and he did not open the door—believe me, he did not.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield.

Mr. CHURCH. With reference to Mr. Homer Harz, I want to emphasize what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUSBEY] has just said about Homer Harz, of Chicago. He is one of the leading citizens of Chicago. He was misled by the conciliator going out there on the taxpayers' money and presenting a paper for him to sign before he knew the facts developed here.

Mr. KEEFE. In this service you have a very lush outfit called the Board of Arbitration Panel which is appointed by Mr. Warren. When the parties get together and say they want an arbitrator then Mr. Warren appoints one of these fellows to be the arbitrator. Do you know what they get? Those jobs are simply terrific. Look at the list of people who are getting all that money. Some of these little unions were scared to death when they got the bill for the little bit of an outfit down here in Florida when they were charged over $6,000 for arbitration fees and expenses. I was told by this gentleman from Chicago Saturday afternoon, who is a member of the Sixth War Labor Board, that this fellow asked him to appoint our former colleague, Mr. Biemiller, to one of these jobs. That will give you some idea. He refused to do it. That will give you a little idea of how this fellow Warren has gotten rid of his radicalism and his radical ideas, when he recommended the appointment of Andy Biemiller for a job as arbiter between management and labor. For God's sake, where are we going?

Mr. ROBSION. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield.

Mr. ROBSION. I have observed the gentleman for many years in dealing with the matter of conciliation and arbitration. He has been a great friend of that service. Like the gentleman, I am interested in conciliation and arbitration of matters in dispute. Is it the gentleman's position that what has been recommended by his committee in removing Mr. Warren or withholding these funds to certain people in Washington will strengthen and not harm the conciliation and arbitration service?

Mr. KEEFE. Why, of course, it will. It is right in line with what the Congress is trying to do. This may all be an academic question before the end of this year. I understand the Committee on Education and Labor is about to pass upon a bill which may deal with this subject and reorganize this conciliation service entirely. We must have a conciliation service but we do not need to build up places to take care of all the old palsy-walsys of Ed Warren that he had over in the War Labor Board, and furnish them all with lush $10,000 a year jobs. That is what they have done. They have done it by firing 39 commissioners out in the field, in order to get the money to put these other birds on the pay roll. That is telling you in plain English what happened.

Mr. REES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield.

Mr. REES. I am just wondering how many of these lush $10,000-a-year jobs, on a percentage basis, you have eliminated, and along with that, on a percentage basis, how much have you reduced this bill as compared with the request of the Bureau of the Budget?

Mr. KEEFE. Well, we have reduced the bill, as compared with the 1947 appropriation, $22,816,000. As to the 1948 estimates, $12,714,000. That sounds small. It is. But it is about 44 percent of money we had to work with. You understand this appropriation for the Department of Labor carries $71,000,000 of appropriation to take care of the administrative expenditures necessary to carry on the Employment Service. That money the Department of Labor simply allocates and turns over to the States to carry on the Employment Service. So that the actual amount of money we had to work on was a little over $30,000,000. Of that we reduced it $12,000,000. Does that answer the gentleman?

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield.

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Would the gentleman care to comment on the fact that six of these so-called conciliators, who are not conciliators at all, were appointed, at least three of them, last spring and the committee was not told last spring what the facts were? These men were not brought in from the field as conciliators.

Mr. KEEFE. If you will turn to the hearings, page 661, you will find that I was fair with Mr. Warren, and in advance of his coming before the committee submitted certain questions that I wanted answered. You will find the questions and answers given beginning on page 661, and you will find a list of names of those people who were appointed, among them people who were appointed as early as February, April, and March, 1946. Those appointments were made before we even met to consider his proposition last year. He knew he was making those appointments in violation of the rules of appropriation, before we ever passed the bill last year. He did not say a word to us about it. That appears now in the record.

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield.

Mr. VURSELL. Is it not a fact that the recommendations of the gentleman from Wisconsin and his committee, if carried out, will be our first opportunity to implement the suggestion of the President in his directive issued last Saturday when he called upon the Congress, and particularly when he issued the directive to get rid of people who might have subversive connections? Is this not our first opportunity to do it today?

Mr. KEEFE. I think it is. I think it is establishing a precedent.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield.

Mr. CHURCH. Is it not apparent that the President held this long-studied method of getting rid of those people until after he knew what the Appropriations Subcommittee was doing?

Mr. KEEFE. I will not say that the President knew about what we were doing or that it influenced him in any way. I can at least say this, Mr. Chairman, that the action of this committee is historical to this extent, that it reiterates in a manner which we believe is not subject to attack in the courts or any other place the power of this Congress to control the purse and to control the expenditures of money; and that is a power that we ought to take back, which we have nearly lost up until now.

Now let me tell you about the apprenticeship-training program. I may say again that the apprenticeship-training program started in my State. The present director, Mr. Patterson, was the director of apprenticeship training in my State. It is a State function, it is not a Federal function at all. Mr. Patterson came down here when we passed the apprenticeship-training law and was made the head of it. I have always been a friend of apprenticeship training and I am now. I put the amendment before the Congress in the GI bill that set up apprenticeship training as one of the functional additions to the GI act. I have not time to go into the details of it except to say that we have given to the apprenticeship-training division here for the Federal Government the same amount of money they had last year, and they will be perfectly happy with it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for 10 additional minutes.

Mr. KEEFE. Now we come to this Bureau of Labor Statistics. Are not some of you people getting a little bit tired of statistics, spending millions of dollars to get a lot of statistics together and then have the CIO, the A. F. of L., or somebody else say they are not worth a damn? Have them say that their own organization has gotten statistics together that prove that the Bureau of Labor Statistics' figures are not worth anything? Are you not a little bit tired of that?

During the war this thing was built up just like you built blocks when you were kids. Do you know how they did it? We appropriated a certain amount of money and then when they came back the next year they told us they had spent over $7,500,000. Where in the world did you get that money? Well, we got a million and a half allocated from OPA; we got another $700,000 from WPB; we got another sum from this agency and that agency. Altogether from all these allocations last year they had about $7,500,000 for which today they are asking for a regular appropriation to implement and carry on work which got started with funds allocated in that way from all these other agencies. Thus they have written into their regular appropriations all of these wartime appropriations that we so diligently tried to get away from when we compelled them to divide their wartime and peacetime activities appropriation-wise.

The committee just cannot go along with that sort of thing. We believe that the cost of living index should be kept going. We have given them the money to carry on this little education business. And, by the way, if you will read the report, you will see that this committee is going to make some investigation of this education business. I think it is high time that the Congress of the United States began to assert itself. Are we going to allow the Labor Department to start a great program of federalized education? They did that over in England, you know; that is how they got a Socialist government. It is exactly the same plan in its genesis that is proposed here, and so far as I am concerned on this item, perhaps before this bill is finished I am not so certain but what it ought to be stricken out and let them go to the Office of Education if it is an educational program and let those courses of less than college grade be given through the vocational system that we have financed to such great extent, and those of college level let them be given in the university extension courses by the various universities.

We have cut this Bureau of Labor Statistics down to where we think it ought to be in 1948. My goodness it only had $784,000 in 1938, yet it has grown to $5,517,000 in 1947, and now they come in and ask for $6,700,000 in 1948. We are giving them $3,373,400. To my mind that is still plenty of money for statistics and all the money they ought to have.

Now, the Employment Service. Funds for that increased sharply when the President made the Employment Service entirely Federal, for there had to be developed here in Washington a Federal Employment Service under the leadership of Bob Goodwin, a very able administrator and a very fine fellow. Now, they sent a lot of money out of the Washington office taking over the direct supervision of all the employment offices of this country, and they used to spend about $6,500,000 in doing that job. Well, Congress put on top of it a veterans' organization headed by a fellow by the name of Faulkner, and he dipped into this fund to the tune of about $1,700,000 to run his show which Secretary of Labor Schwellenbach testified before the committee was simply nuts. That was his expression. He said, "That program is nuts." That comes from the Secretary of Labor. That is in the record. Well, we sent these offices back to the States, did we not, last November, and the States are running that show, and all they need at the Federal level is an office to get together the standards that can be sent out to the States and to place the funds out in the States, to allocate the funds that are allotted for administration in the States. That is all Bob Goodwin has to do.

So we have cut him down to $900,000. Do you know why? Oh, these papers are squawking that we have massacred the USES. They had an article in the Post the other day how this committee has massacred the USES. Now, I am sure you have heard of unemployment compensation that is administered by the Social Security Board, have you not? They spend hundreds of millions of dollars and have just as many offices as has the employment services. They go hand in hand. Do you know how much money they spend for administration, and they have exactly the same function to perform as has the USES under Bob Goodwin? The Social Security Administration administers the funds for unemployment compensation, and they get $900,000 for doing that, and the committee said, "Mr. Goodwin, you haven't any bigger job to perform than they have. It is an identical job, almost; same office, same type of thing, one at one end of the office and one at the other end, but we are going to give you that amount of money," and he will be able to do the job for what he has to do. He does not have to look after all of these offices as he did when they were federalized. The States have them back, and that is why we are giving him $71,000,000 to administer the job in the States. Do not let anybody kid you about it. It is just one damnable job to get rid of one of these barnacles when they are on the old Ship of State here, and you are going to be a pretty unpopular guy if you head the job and wield the ax. Yes, Drew Pearson will take a sock at you and so will Walter Winchell. He did at me last night, and he did at JOHN TABER, and they are after anybody that has the guts and the courage to look them straight in the eye across the table, as this committee did, and say "Gentlemen, you are through. We mean what we say. This is a new situation. The people spoke last November and by the eternal gods we are going to see that what they asked for is carried out, and you are not going to fool us on that situation."

Now, they said that we are going to strip the Women's Bureau. Yes, we are going to kill the Women's Bureau, they say, and I guess I have received a thousand letters as a result. We are going to kill the women of America. We are going to do away with all women's rights. Oh, what an ungodly committee that is.

Do you know how that came about? Frieda Miller was up there. She is the head of it, and she is a nice person, she originated in my State, and she wants to do a good job in the Women's Bureau. This is in the record. So when we got all through I said, "Miss Miller, you are not going to get any increase over what you had last year. Supposing the committee decided to cut your outfit 10 or 25 percent of what you had last year, how would you allocate the cut?"

"Hoo-hoo," she said. Her hands went back and she pretty nearly died and she said they would not be able to run it at all. "Well," I said, "that may be a good reason to do away with the whole outfit then," just facetiously. It appears in the record. So the word went out. The teletype got busy to every woman's club in America, "KEEFE is going to assassinate the Women's Bureau," and they began to come in. They did not know what they were talking about. That Women's Bureau was created in 1922 under a Republican administration, and I am not one to assassinate it. I think it is doing some work that is worth while. Just what it is, I do not know. It is doing a lot of work, perhaps, that is worth while, so I am told by a lot of people, some of whom wrote me and told me about what a great organization it was, and at the bottom of the letter was a P. S. reading, "What is this Women's Bureau, anyway?"

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself two additional minutes.

They never heard of it. Well, we left it there as it was and hope they get along and do a good job.

Now, there is one thing that I want to talk about if I have the time. This is a tremendous bill. I want to talk to you just a little bit about this hospital program. There are certain men on my right that just go about clapping their hands every time they think that they can demonstrate that we are not going to be able to save any money. Oh, how the gentleman from Tennessee has been quoted in the paper and how others on this side have let loose with barrages to the effect that this cut is just a phony. In this case he is talking about a cut, as he was quoted in the paper, that was thoroughly approved by the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROONEY], his own ranking Democrat on the committee, approved by Dr. Parran completely, and approved by the General Counsel's office of the Federal Security Agency.

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ROONEY. Is it not a fact that there is no cut in the bill at all with regard to hospital construction?

Mr. KEEFE. I do not yield any further on that. That is the gentleman's story. He has been harping on that. The gentleman ran in here to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] to tell him about it before the bill had ever been reported. We know about that, too. So let that be as it may, we have never intended nor have we tried to show that there was any cut. The gentleman knows that as well as anyone knows it, and so does his friend from Rhode Island know it as well as anyone knows it.

Mr. FOGARTY. No; I do not know that.

Mr. KEEFE. If the gentleman will listen to me a minute I will tell him what he does know. He knows that this committee in its report never claimed that we cut $50,000,000 from this budget, yet you have tried to make the American people believe that. Let me tell you the truth about it and I hope you want to tell your men the truth. When we were considering this bill, we got into quite an argument on this $50,000,000 hospital program. Every man on the committee wanted to implement that Hill-Burton bill. I did; I am for it. I want to see these hospitals built, and you know it. I have expressed myself over the country on that subject. But here we were with a bill that provided an authorization of $75,000,000 for 1947, $75,000,000 for 1948, and $75,000,000 for three succeeding years. The beneficiaries were to provide $2 for every $1 we provided under that bill. The budget sent up a proposal here to appropriate $50,000,000 out of a total authorization of $175,000,000.

The question was asked, and I asked it, "How are you going to pay this money out? Who is going to get it? Is it going to be first come first served? Suppose you get $100,000,000 or $150,000,000 of approved program coming from just two States, are they going to get this whole $50,000,000? How is this thing going to be handled?"

That presented another question. The boys had not thought of that. So we went to work and, with the assistance of Mr. Arthur Orr, one of the clerks of the committee, with the assistance of Dr. Parran, and with the assistance of the General Counsel of the Federal Security Agency, we worked out the language that is in this bill. It has the unanimous approval of all parties concerned, because under the language of this bill we do not limit the expenditure at the Federal level to $50,000,000, we say to the State under this law, "If you go out and raise the money to meet the dollars that we have raised or will raise, you can go ahead with your program and the Federal Government will match it as a contractual obligation." If the States raise $150,000,000, we will put up $75,000,000. My Democratic friends know that is the truth as well as anything. We do not claim there was any cut in this budget as a result of that action, but we do claim we are carrying out the will of Congress with respect thereto. Do not let anybody kid you on this floor that we have made a lot of phony cuts.

I want to tell you one or two other things, and that is all I have time for. I wish I had a couple of hours to go through this here. This committee has done a remarkable job, and I mean all the members of the committee, in bringing this bill to you. It is the most difficult bill that comes before this Congress. I do not say I have done any remarkable job but the committee has in going through this situation.

Let me show you. We cannot cut the social-security program, do you realize that? Eighty-nine and nine-tenths percent of the total of the appropriation for the Federal Security Agency is for grants under the social-security program and under the public-health program. Three and three-tenths percent is for operation of hospitals. Two percent is for the operation of educational institutions. A total of 93.2 percent of the entire appropriation for the Federal Security Agency is for those categories. Is there any way that we can cut the maintenance of St. Elizabeths Hospital? Can we cut the maintenance of the marine hospitals throughout the country?

Can we cut the budget of Howard University or Freedmen's Hospital?

We went beyond the budget and said, "No; not only will we not cut that, but we will provide more funds than the Bureau of the Budget provided."

We gave Freedmen's Hospital enough money here to clean that hospital up and take care of those people as they should be taken care of.

We gave $6,000,000 more for the cancer-research program than was allowed by the Bureau of the Budget. We have provided for a real cancer program. My colleagues, I wish I had 1 hour to tell you about that program alone.

We provided all the funds necessary for research in heart disease, poliomyelitis, tuberculosis, research in mental illnesses, and so on.

We provided the facilities for the establishment of this huge hospital at Bethesda which my friend, the gentleman from Tennessee, worked so hard for. We provided the funds to get that started and to provide for the clinical experience to take care of these programs.

We are supposed to be a lot of old wild reactionaries because we cut a little off the Department of Labor. We gave the Public Health and Federal Security Agency, which deal with the health and public welfare of human beings throughout this land, all the money they asked for and more than the Bureau of the Budget saw fit to give them. The cuts we have made in the Department of Labor are those cuts that will enable the Department to function better than they have functioned heretofore. There will not be quite so much confusion or overlapping or duplication of effort and service and there will not be quite so many lush $10,000-a-year men such as they have down there at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. ROONEY] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 20 minutes at this point.

Mr. Chairman, the prosecution has rested.

Oh, in talk he's a wonder, but oh, how small are the gains.
Oh, how loud is his thunder, but oh, how little it rains.

We have just heard a great deal, but nothing about the over-all figures in connection with this annual appropriation bill. From the report, it might appear to the American people that the slash in the amounts requested by the Labor Department and the Federal Security Agency for the fiscal year 1948 was another advance toward a $6,000,000,000 cut in the President's budget. But oh, no. My friends on the other side of the aisle have now dropped the second dribble into the budget bucket. The first dribble was in the Treasury-Post Office bill, when they tried to show that there was a saving therein of about $890,000,000. Lo, it then appeared that the fact of the matter was that the actual cut was about $90,000,000, or approximately seven-tenths of 1 percent of the full amount of the bill, and that $803,200,000 was temporarily and falsely saved by use of a clever pencil. We immediately found that the alleged cut was only in refunds and draw-backs for the Internal Revenue Bureau and the Customs Service, which eventually would have to be paid out of the Treasury.

Now, as I said, we are along to the second dribble in the budget bucket. The President through his Bureau of the Budget requested funds for the Labor Department and the Federal Security Agency for the coming fiscal year in the amount of $1,763,412,300. Using the majority's figures as now presented to this House the cut which is claimed in the report in the amount of $77,825,520 is less than 4½ percent of the President's budget estimate. But they are still playing with figures and using a clever pencil because there is a peculiar and misleading item in this bill, to which the charming gentleman from Wisconsin referred, in the amount $50,100,000 for hospital and construction activities of the Public Health Service. If you will look at the report—I believe it is on page 44—you will find that there has been a reduction in the amount requested for this purpose by the Bureau of the Budget, so claims the gentleman from Wisconsin, of $50,100,000.

The facts with regard to that $50,100,000 item are these: The full subcommittee, both the minority and the majority, were in entire accord with the program for hospital construction activities requested by the Bureau of the Budget. There came into play the question of how the funds would be properly allocated among the States by Dr. Parran and the Public Health Service. A splendid suggestion was made by Mr. Orr, one of our most competent clerks, following the language of a clause in the public-roads bill, that similar language be inserted in this bill, so that the full amount, $50,100,000, would be allowable to Dr. Parran as it was needed and as soon as the construction plans were received and approved by the Public Health Service for the erection of the hospitals in the States, under which plan the States contribute two-thirds and the Federal Government one-third of the full program. Now, the clause inserted in this bill provides not only that the Public Health Service shall have $50,100,000 for the ensuing fiscal year for hospital construction, but that the Public Health Service may have as much as $150,000,000 under the terms of the Hill-Burton bill and the language on page 21 of the present bill. This being so, the budget-slashing team has been thrown for a loss on the 50-yard line to the extent of $72,274,480. Instead of the figure shown in the report, a claimed reduction from the budget estimate of $77,825,520, the fact is that this committee has allowed the amount $72,274,480 over and beyond the amount of the present budget estimate. This cannot be denied.

Now, I would like to take up the matter of Mr. Warren, Director of the Conciliation Service. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE], very appropriately stated that I would say to the House that I hate communism as much as anyone on either side of the aisle. He knows that if I thought Warren was a Communist sympathizer or a follower of the Communist line I would be right on his neck. I know something about their insidious propaganda activities. There is no Member of this House whom they hate more than me. They have fought me since I have been a Member of Congress, and I have defeated them at every turn. But, what about these charges against Warren? Have we now arrived at the point where a congressional committee or a one-man grand jury, prosecutor and policeman can dictate who shall be a Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, by striking from the annual judiciary appropriation bill the moneys to pay him his legal salary? Has the Congress reached the point where it is going to interfere with the executive department to the extent that an appointee to the Court of St. James' by the President may be recalled and renamed by the failure and refusal of a congressional committee to appropriate the money to pay his salary?

Now, who is Mr. Edgar L. Warren? I do not know him personally or socially. I met him when he first appeared before the committee. I will give you his biography.

Mr. Warren was born in Pittsburgh in 1904 and was graduated from Bethany College, Bethany, W. Va., in 1926. He did graduate work at the Harvard Business School, United States Department of Agriculture School, and Brookings Institution. From 1927 to 1933 he was connected with the Ralston Purina Co. in St. Louis, Mo., as salesman and sales supervisor and economist. From 1933 to 1938 he was an economist with the Department of Agriculture in Washington. From 1938 to November 1942 he was an economist and later director of the industry committee branch of the Wage and Hour Division, Department of Labor. In November 1942, Mr. Warren was appointed assistant director of the Wage Stabilization Division of the National War Labor Board. He also served as public member of the Wage Adjustment Board, as acting deputy director of the National Board in Charge of Industrial Missions. In 1943 he became chairman of the Seventh Regional War Labor Board at Kansas City, Mo., and later served as chairman of the Sixth Regional War Labor Board, in Chicago. Mr. Warren was appointed director of the United States Conciliation Service on September 23, 1945.

This attack directed to Mr. Warren is an old chestnut, as appears from last year's hearings before this same committee. At that time he was questioned extensively by the present chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE]. I am going to read you a few questions and answers from which I trust you may be able to gain an insight into the kind of man Mr. Warren is.

Mr. KEEFE. Assuming there was a strike among the workers of the Government in cafeterias operated by this so-called nonprofit organization that is not, in fact, operated by the Government, but in sympathy therewith those employees who are on the Government pay roll walked out and went on strike and you, as the head of the Conciliation Service, were called in to settle the strike affecting these Government workers: What would your attitude be?

Mr. WARREN. As far as Government workers are concerned, they certainly cannot strike.

Mr. KEEFE. Why not?

Mr. WARREN. They are not allowed to strike by Executive order. There is a specific provision against striking on the part of Government employees.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, suppose they did?

Mr. WARREN. Well, as a matter of fact, I, of course, am not in sympathy with strikes as such at all and I feel my function is to prevent and avoid strikes and stop them where we can.

At another point:

Mr. WARREN. I would like to have the record clearly show that I am opposed to strikes of Government employees.

Mr. KEEFE. All right; I want that brought out in the record.

Mr. WARREN. I would like to have the record clearly show that.

Mr. KEEFE. You are in sympathy then, with the policy that has been announced by the President?

Mr. WARREN. I am very much in sympathy with that policy.

Mr. KEEFE. Which I have heretofore placed in this record.

Mr. WARREN. I am very much in sympathy with that policy.

At another point—referring to the Chicago forum statement:

Mr. WARREN. Mr. KEEFE, I did not say that Government employees have the right to strike; I simply said, that on a purely theoretical basis, I could not see why a distinction should be made on the part of the employee just by reason of his Government service as distinguished from other factors. I feel that there are many strikes that might be more serious from the standpoint of public welfare than strikes by Government employees. That is the only thing I said.

The following appears at page 151 of last year's hearings:

Mr. KEEFE. And I think it would be well to have both the Congress and the public know that in this broad, big field of conciliation you have had pretty signal success in settling these things.

Mr. WARREN. Yes; judged on a percentage basis, the Conciliation Service has been very successful.

Let me tell you something about the Conciliation Service. A year and a half ago the representatives of management joined with those of labor in a unanimous report on the Conciliation Service. They concluded that an impartial and efficient Service "will be a strong force in minimizing industrial disputes and preventing strikes." The entire weight of the testimony and opinion before both the House and Senate Labor Committees during the present Congress also have agreed upon this. Indeed, it is the one important fundamental of a Government labor policy on which there is full agreement. But the President's Labor-Management Conference also unanimously concluded that to achieve an impartial and effective Service it had to be strengthened and reorganized—and I am quoting the words "strengthened" and "reorganized." The report of the majority of this committee, on the other hand, completely eliminates all of the improvements developed in the last 18 months and returns the Service to an even weaker state than existed at the time of that conference.

Every single recommendation of that Labor-Management Conference was followed in developing the Service. Every one of these is repudiated by the report of the majority of this subcommittee.

The conference unanimously said to reorganize the Service. That has been done and a strong decentralized supervision has been established. This report completely eliminates this program.

The conference urged the use of a strong and representative joint advisory committee. That committee has collaborated in every policy change. Its representatives have testified to the progress that has been made in the Service in line with its recommendations. The subcommittee report, on the other hand, completely dismisses all the improvements made on the advice of both management and labor.

The conference unanimously recommended that commissioners of conciliation be given practical training and information on policies, techniques, labor laws, and industrial-relations trends. By conferences, and by distribution of factual and analytical material, the work of conciliators has been improved. On the other hand, this subcommittee report eliminates the funds for all these activities.

A handful of people, I believe seven, were brought from the Washington, D. C., field office in to the Washington, D. C., departmental office and because Mr. Warren did not previously advise the chairman and this subcommittee of what he was going to do, he is now on the carpet of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The fact is this House and this Congress went into recess last August. It became impossible for Mr. Warren to bring his plans before Congress until he promptly did so at the end of the month of January of this year.

The Labor-Management Conference insisted that there must be an adequate number of conciliators for prompt and efficient service. The Department has designed its program to the current and prospective needs of the Nation. It should be noted that there is no word of criticism in the entire report on the successful record of the Service. Yet the majority of this committe eliminated not only some 25 top supervisory jobs but also some 20 field commissioner positions as well. Labor and management did not believe that was the way to reduce strikes.

The conference called for a reorganization of the arbitration facilities of the Service and the development of a list of per diem employees cleared by labor and management representatives. That reorganization is largely accomplished and the new policies are being administered. The committee report eliminates the central staff responsible for carrying through such a program and sharply reduces the funds for arbitrators.

The conference unanimously recommended a reorganization and building up of the technical engineering services and the collaboration of a technical labor-management advisory committee. Such a joint advisory committee is established. With its collaboration the recommended reorganization is being carried through. The Appropriations Committee report abolishes the central staff, substantially reduces the number of technical men and blocks all opportunity for a strong technical service.

Obviously the majority have repudiated the entire program for Government mediation as a basis for industrial peace which labor and management representatives unanimously adopted. Apparently it has decided that the improvements should be abandoned and the Conciliation Service made impotent. This is the road to industrial chaos, not industrial peace.

Since Mr. Warren became Director of the Conciliation Service in 1945, I believe sometime along about the month of November, he has earned the plaudits not only of labor, but of industry as well. I am going to read to you a number of passages from various letters signed by men prominent in the management field, and I am sure you will agree that if Mr. Warren is the man that the gentleman from Wisconsin claims him to be, he would never receive such glowing praise. If he were a Communist, or a follower of communistic ideas, he could never have taken the position he did in all his activities since he became Director of the Conciliation Service.

Briefly, a word in regard to the charges that he was a member of the American League for Peace and Democracy and that at one time he was a member of the Washington Book Shop. Mr. Warren, while employed some years ago down in the Department of Labor in a minor position, was one of those gentlemen who liked to join employees' and other cooperatives. You have met some of these people who like cooperatives, where they can obtain automobile tires at a discount, and where they can obtain clothing and jewelry and other merchandise at a discount. It was suggested to him—and his story is in the record—that he join a new organization that was then forming, to join a book cooperative. He tells me that he paid $1 to become a member of the Washington Book Shop, and after 2 months he found that a Communist group had taken it over; that it was no longer the Washington Book Shop but the Communist Book Shop, and he immediately resigned and had nothing further to do with it.

In regard to the American League for Peace and Democracy, who is not in favor of peace and democracy? Mr. Warren did not know as I do and as I have known for some time that the American League for Peace and Democracy is and was a Communist front organization. He belonged to it for 2 or 3 months, no longer, and then, having found that it was directed and controlled by Communists, he immediately resigned.

Now, let me read from these letters that I referred to awhile ago. I first wish to refer to a statement of five former members of the War Labor Board, including its three wartime chairmen, who have joined in a public statement endorsing the loyalty and ability of Edgar L. Warren, Director of the United States Conciliation Service:

We knew and worked with Edgar Warren throughout the war period and found him at all times to be a fine and loyal American. In his work he ably and impartially represented the public interest. We delegated important, difficult, and delicate responsibilities and tasks to him and he came through in fine shape demonstrating to all of us by his actions that he is a loyal and devoted citizen.

The five signers of this statement, all of whom knew Mr. Warren more intimately than the gentleman from Wisconsin, were:

William H. Davis, attorney, Davis, Hoxie & Faithful, New York, N. Y., member NYC Board of Transportation, formerly chairman NWLTS and director Office of Economic Stabilization; George W. Taylor, chairman, advisory board of the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion; professor of industrial relations, Wharton School of Finance U. of P., Philadelphia, Pa., former chairman NWLB.

Frank P. Graham, president, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, N. C., former public member NWLB, chairman secretary's Fact Finding Board for the Oil Industry; Dr. Edwin E. Witte, professor of economics, University of Wisconsin, Madison, Wis., public member NWLB, chairman Secretary's Fact Finding Board for Meat Packing Industry; Lloyd K. Garrison, attorney, Paul, Weiss, Wharton & Garrison, New York, N. Y., formerly chairman NWLB, dean law school, University of Wisconsin, chairman of President's Fact Finding Board in the General Motors case.

Senator MORSE, who also served as a former public member of the WLB, has announced his complete disapproval of any attempt to smear Mr. Warren, asserting that Warren's loyalty to our form of government and his patriotism is as fine and true as that of any Member of Congress or other loyal American.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 additional minutes.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROONEY. Not at this point.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Just for a question?

Mr. ROONEY. I have not the time at this point.

Now, with regard to these letters directed to Mr. Warren and to the Secretary of Labor. The first is one from George S. Dring, the assistant vice president of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., Long Lines Department, 32 Sixth Avenue, New York, not dated now or in answer to a request concerning the present charges of the gentleman from Wisconsin, but dated back on March 13, 1946:

DEAR MR. WARREN: Now that we are back on home grounds again and labor matters have quieted down, I want you to know that we are greatly appreciative of the manner in which you, your people, and Mr. Gibson handled our recent wage case.

The time and patience put into our case by you, Mr. Gibson, Mr. Caldwell, and Mr. Manno, together with your tireless efforts in obtaining a clearer understanding of the complicated details associated with it, in my opinion, played an important part in the final settlement of the case. Thus, through the combined efforts of the forces of the Secretary of Labor, the union, and ourselves, we were able to avoid what might have resulted in a serious interruption to the Nation's communications system.

In closing, I wish to again thank you and your people for a job well done.

I have one from the St. Louis Public Service Co., of St. Louis, Mo. Here is a letter from the vice president and general manager, Mr. S. W. Greenland, in which he says to Mr. Warren:

I am sure that you have been advised by your efficient staff of the outcome of the negotiations we have had with members of the amalgamated association here in St. Louis. We were on the verge of a strike, but fortunately the vote of the membership was for arbitration, as proposed by representatives of your department, instead of a strike.

I want to take this occasion to commend the very fine help and cooperation that the union as well as we received from your representatives, Messrs. White, Johnson, and Fillo. All of them are well trained, efficient and effective, and to them should be given great credit for the way this controversy ended. The manner in which these gentlemen performed reflects credit on you who have been directing their efforts.

Here is a letter to Mr. Warren from the business editor of the Ohio State Journal, Mr. Justin Henley, of Columbus, Ohio.

As a newspaperman, I have had the opportunity on several recent occasions to come in close contact with the work of the United States Conciliation Service and to observe its efforts to restore and maintain labor-management peace in the Columbus area.

From my observations, I am convinced that the Service has made important contributions to the economic well-being and contentment of this community during the past few months. The efforts of your representatives have been of value not only in bringing about a settlement of strikes, but in their unpublicized, behind-the-scene labors in preventing them.

I have in hand letter after letter, from the Duquesne Smelting Corp., from the National Association of Manufacturers, which at the bottom of its letterhead states that it has been the champion of the American enterprise system since 1895, and one, hardly communistic, from the Crosley Corp., a number of extracts from the National Association of Manufacturers News, letters from the Baltimore Poreclain Steel Corp., the Dravo Corp. of Pittsburgh, the Standard Felt Co. of Alhambra, Calif., the Celanese Corp. of America, and Mr. Tom Freeman, president of the Chicago Association of Commerce, addressed to Mr. Warren, not at this time, but back in July of 1946, it says:

You have been doing some good work. Your old associates here who worked with you when you were Chairman of the Sixth Regional War Labor Board have watched your career with interest and pride.

I have letters from the Bridgeport Brass Co.; Hart, Schaffner & Marx; and from any number of Government agencies that were confronted at some time or another with strikes, all complimentary to Mr. Warren.

Under permission which I expect to obtain later when the committee reports to the House I shall include at this point a letter from the assistant director, policy industrial relations department, National Association of Manufacturers, dated January 17, 1947:

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MANUFACTURERS,
New York, N. Y., January 17, 1947.

MR. EDGAR L. WARREN,
Director, United States Conciliation Service, United States Department of Labor, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WARREN: It was a great pleasure to have you present the major address at our Boca Raton Institute on Industrial Relations.

You dealt with a subject that is of paramount interest to industry and left our participants with a clear picture of what the Conciliation Service can contribute to free collective bargaining and—equally important—your strong views against compulsory arbitration. Both Carroll French and I feel that your talk did much to clarify both these issues.

On behalf of the NAM, and speaking for Mr. French and myself, please accept our sincere appreciation for the contribution you made to the success of our 5-day Institute.

Sincerely,

SYBYL S. PATTERSON,
Assistant Director, Policy Industrial Relations Department.

The following appeared in the January 18, 1947, NAM News:

CONCILIATION CHIEF WARNS ON COMPULSORY ARBITRATION PERILS

Government sits now at the collective-bargaining table strictly in the role of conciliator. No agency can order an employer to write any particular clause or condition into any labor contract. This means Edgar L. Warren, Director of the United States Conciliation Service, told the Institute, that "today the full responsibility for continuous production rests wholly with employers and unions."

He urged quicker resort to conciliation when strikes are threatened. And he warned that if strikes don't stop, Congress is likely to "consider seriously some form of compulsory arbitration." He added:

"That, of course, will be the first step to many other compulsions.

"Once the Government is permanently in the business of deciding the wage increase every year—in peace as it did in war—then inevitably the Government will have to make other decisions on prices and production schedules."

Clarence B. Randall, taking note of the Conciliation Service director's warning on compulsory pricing and compulsory production as a consequence of compulsory arbitration, was quoted in the press as follows:

"This view * * * confirms what the NAM all along has been telling industry and the public—that compulsory arbitration means the death of free enterprise.

"Without freedom to determine prices and to plan production schedules, enterprise would be Government controlled, lock, stock, and barrel. It is to be hoped that this will dispel some of the current illusions about special labor courts and other devices as a cure-all for industrial strife."

Mr. Warren assured the industrialists that the Conciliation Service was doing all in its power to make its conciliators act impartially. He decried criticism of conciliators with union backgrounds as agents likely to be biased. He declared that on the contrary those have the advantage of knowing techniques of negotiations and understanding union values; they are unlikely to be confused by union tactics, he contended.

In the past year, he said "we have been working hard to create a mediation agency in which both unions and employers can have confidence. I believe that we have come a long way on that path in 12 months. I would like to say that in this effort, we have had some able assistance from Carroll French, the industrial relations director of the NAM."

The following is an excerpt from the report of March 8, 1946, meeting of the Labor-Management Advisory Committee:

Before taking up the agenda, Mr. Warren told the committee of an anonymous letter claiming to speak for a Committee of Commissioners of Conciliation, which had been received by a number of Commissioners, in which charges were made that several employees of the Conciliation Service had been displaced by former members of the War Labor Board staff, etc. He touched briefly on his statement to the press with respect to this letter and named 13 persons from the War Labor Board (whose personnel had numbered 2,600) who have been employed by the Conciliation Service. Six of them, he said, came to the Service at the same salary they received from the War Labor Board; 6 took a salary reduction, and 1 came at a salary higher than that which he received from the War Labor Board. The background of each of the 13 individuals was discussed, and the committee, believing that the Conciliation Service should avail itself of the services of experienced people from the War Labor Board, expressed general approval. Mr. Warren mentioned that most of the members of the Washington staff holding key positions and the Regional Directors had received a promotion in grade and salary since his appointment as Director, and that no one had been demoted.

The committee as a whole indicated its pleasure with the actions of the Director, and Mr. Sarnoff referred to the "outstanding accomplishment of the Director and the Service in the settlement of the American Telephone and Telegraph Co. threatened strike. The committee felt that no importance should be attached to the anonymous letter, and offered to give the Director a vote of confidence. Mr. Warren said he was satisfied with their expressions and did not wish a vote of confidence.

The Executive's Labor Letter issued a week or two ago contained the following editorial:

The caliber of the United States Conciliation Service has improved noticeably since the appointment of Edgar L. Warren as its head. This fact accounts for the shock among industrial relations men created by Representative FRANK KEEFE'S threat "to do everything in my power" to oust Warren. (KEEFE is chairman of the House Appropriations subcommittee which is reviewing the budget for the Department of Labor.)

With the unanimous approval of a Management-Labor Advisory Committee, Warren has strengthened the conciliation work of the Service by training its staff in the art of conciliation, supplying them with necessary informational and technical tools, improving the quality of their supervision, and raising their morale principally by getting them long-overdue salary increases. He has also increased the Service's effectiveness in preventing labor disputes by expanding the technical job evaluation and wage incentive assistance it provides industry.

Unfortunately, Warren made the mistake of exceeding his budget. He was forced several months ago to let some conciliators go. When many of the dismissed men took their complaints to their congressional sponsors (the Service is not under civil service), the unwarranted attack upon Warren began. This campaign may succeed if there are many Congressmen who wrongly believe that the Conciliation Service is a labor-partisan agency.

Warren, aware of this allegation, has done as much as he could to contradict it with facts. He has been trying to persuade employers of the public relations advantage that lies in "beating unions to the gun" by calling for the services of a Federal conciliator. He has also been seeking to eradicate from employers' minds certain common misconceptions of what conciliators can and cannot do. They cannot, he recently told an NAM industrial relations institute:

1. Make plant inspections.
2. Require employers to fill out any forms.
3. Order an employer to do anything.
4. Take an employer to court.
5. Testify in court or in Government hearings on any details of any dispute in which they acted as mediators.
6. Make any public statements against either employer or union.

Their only power is "the power of persuasion and the cold eye and clear head that an impartial third party can contribute in a crisis."

Everyone knows that today the Conciliation Service is one bulwark, together with the National Labor Relations Board, which can keep industrial peace in this country. We are being penny-wise and pound-foolish at this time if we proceed with the proposal of the gentleman from Wisconsin to cut the appropriation for the Conciliation Service to the tune of approximately $600,000 and lay off all the directors and employees he contemplated.

The minority did not agree with the majority in any instance concerning the appropriations for the Department of Labor. We felt that it was such a drastic cut, to the extent of 40 percent of operating expenses, and an attendant lay-off of practically 2,400 out of 7,200 employees in the Labor Department, that we would be doing the people of this country a disservice to even consider going along with it. What has been gained by the cut? The comparatively small amount, $12,000,000, cripples the Labor Department. Just think of it, $12,714,500 as compared with $1,763,412,300, the total amount of appropriations contained in this appropriation bill we are now considering. And, then, we practically have no Labor Department.

Let me tell you about the apprentice-training service. They have been cut, cut over 21 percent. They have been cut to the tune of $528,600. Still, the proof is that their program has grown as follows: Number of establishments participating, January 1, 1946, 30,628, as compared with January 1, 1947, 76,753—an increase of 157 percent. You know what the apprentice-training program is. It is an entirely voluntary program. The employers and employees participate in it because they want to, not because the Government says they must.

Take the item for the Vocational Rehabilitation Service. There were 85 State agencies for 1948 through which the Department expected to give service to 374,000 crippled persons as compared with 287,000 for the present fiscal year. Although the number of serviced crippled persons has increased from 287,000 in the present fiscal year to 374,000 in the fiscal year 1948, almost 32 percent of the budget estimate has been cut from the amount for the administration expenses of the Office of Vocational Rehabilitation.

The minority of this committee would not agree to cut $1,710,000, or almost 9 percent of the budget estimate for the grants to States for this meritorious service. Let us see some of the things this service does. I am trying to find some figures I have here where it is shown that the amount of income earned by these crippled people has greatly increased as the result of the work of the Office of Vocational Rehabilitation, by putting them back on their feet again so that they can go to work and increase their earning capacity—increase their earning capacity and pay taxes and share in the functions of government just as everyone else. In 1946, 36,100 persons were rehabilitated and became gainfully employed. Prior to receiving this service, they only earned eleven and one-half million dollars a year. An increase of $44,800,000 in wage-earning capacity resulted, and these people now earn $56,300,000 a year, or an average of $1,620 per individual. Again, it is penny-wise and pound-foolish to cut this appropriation for the Office of Vocational Rehabilitation.

Let us consider the National Labor Relations Board, which has been thoroughly gutted by the majority members of this committee. They asked a total of $7,984,000 and were cut to the tune of 50 percent of the amount of the budget estimate. This in the face of the present labor unrest in the country. This in the face of the fact that the members of the National Labor Relations Board testified that it is impossible for the Board to handle cases promptly under present conditions, which include an increase in case intake for the first 7 months of the present fiscal year of about 65 percent over the corresponding period of the previous year, and a present staff in the 1947 fiscal year which was 25 percent below that of the last fiscal year.

Is it good economy at this time, gentlemen, to interfere with both industry and labor who wish to appear before the National Labor Relations Board and have their cases promptly determined? When the question of an election in a plant arises, is it good sense to compel the parties to wait months upon months upon months? Under such circumstances it is easy for Communists to start agitating and say, "Let us go out on strike and to so-and-so with it." We want such matters handled by orderly process. This cannot be done unless this Congress appropriates sufficient moneys for such items in this bill as the National Labor Relations Board appropriation.

Take the Wage and Hour and Public Contracts Division of the Department of Labor. There the cut is over 22 percent of the budget estimate. I would like to point out that there are approximately 550,000 establishments with a total of 20,000,000 covered employees subject to the Fair Labor Standards Act which this division polices. The records of that division show that for the last few years about half of the establishments which they inspected were found to be in violation of the major provisions of this act; that is, in the minimum wage requirements they were paying, mind you, less than $16 a week for a 40-hour week, the minimum wage being 40 cents an hour—violation of the Fair Labor Standards Act in connection with overtime provisions and the child-labor provisions. The Director testified before this committee that they are only able to inspect, in the course of a year, for the purpose of finding these violations about 45,000 or 8 percent of the total number of establishments which come under their jurisdiction. Nearly 380,000 establishments or two-thirds of the total number have never been inspected during the past 8 years. I am sure you do not want this situation to continue. What are you going to do about it?

The amount of child-labor violations have been appalling, and if in this country we are going to permit business establishments to continue to use child labor, we are returning to the backwoods. We are not even maintaining the gains we have made in this direction during the past 15 or 20 years.

If I had the time I would like to discuss every single item in this bill. The Members of the minority cooperated fully with the majority in sustaining items with reference to the public health and public welfare, such as for venereal diseases, for hospital construction activities, as I have already pointed out, for hospitals and medical care, and for all other programs of the Public Health Service, including the cancer program. It was by unanimous agreement between the minority and the majority that the amount of the budget estimate in connection with the cancer program was increased by $6,000,000. Personally, I do not feel that is enough. I feel it is not the way to go about attacking the cancer question. I feel the only way to attack it is to give to the President of the United States $100,000,000 and have him gather together experts from every country in the world and attack it as we did the atom bomb. To my mind it is just as important to fine a cure for cancer as it was to find the atomic bomb.

In conclusion, may I point out again that this method of liquidating the Labor Department by cutting its operating expenses 40 percent is going to bode no good. We just cannot go back 20 years. We can never go back. That is shown in the amount of allowance of total appropriations in this bill by this committee as compared with the amount of the budget estimates. I shall again remind you of this fact, that this bill, in the over-all picture, does not make a dent in the proposed legislative budget cut of $6,000,000,000, because it actually adds $72,274,480 to the amount requested by the President's Bureau of the Budget.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. FOGARTY].

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Chairman, until the sudden emergence of an important issue in foreign affairs, it is safe to say the attention of the entire country was focused on the importance of stable industrial relations. The present majority party in Congress, in speeches, press releases, proposed legislation, and countless other ways, pointed up this importance of harmonious relations between labor and management.

The chief agency in the Federal system for the promotion of these harmonious relations is the Department of Labor—a branch of the Government of Cabinet rank—having intimate and complex relations with all phases of our industrial life.

What do we find happens today to this Department? We find that the majority on this committee has seen fit to cut 44 percent of the proposed budget of 1948 in the Labor Department. This reduction, cutting the Department of Labor almost in half, comes at a time when the majority party today has recommended new legislation and amendments to old laws which it claims will promote industrial stability. Who is going to administer those laws? Who is going to carry into effect the already expressed will of Congress? How can it be supposed that labor will believe it can get a square deal from Congress when the Department of Labor is being emasculated in the manner suggested in this appropriation bill?

The committee has wiped out entirely the Division of Labor Standards. One of the principal functions of this Division is to cooperate with the States, in reality to encourage the States to establish and maintain proper working conditions, to promote safety in industrial establishments, cut down accidents and deaths due to the failure to observe proper standards of safety.

The loss of this Division of the Labor Department will be a serious blow and will result in substantial losses in our national income instead of promoting economy.

Our economy is geared to a high level of national income. Industrial accidents constitute the greatest interference with the level of production which is necessary to maintain that high level of national income. One witness before the committee reported from statistics that there are 2,000,000 accidents a year in industry. They cost American industry and labor better than $3,000,000,000 a year. That is lost purchasing power, producing power, taxpaying power. That is tragic waste which the Division of Labor Standards has been working to eliminate.

It has been argued that this kind of function is properly the responsibility of the States. All the operations of this Division were in cooperation with the States. The States have demonstrated that they are unable or unwilling to undertake to do this job properly. The Division of Labor standards has demonstrated on the other hand that it can and will get the job done.

The Division has also acted as a clearing house for information and material having to do with the education of employers and employees in their respective rights and responsibilities.

Through its educational functions the Division has worked hard to promote intelligent cooperation between management and labor. Its influence has been felt in schools, universities, and civic associations of many kinds throughout the country.

We talk about the desirability of an honest approach to the intricate problems of industrial relations. This Division aimed at charting a clear, wide path through all the problems which affect these relations. It is making headway. Such service is needed and wanted. It should not be curtailed now when it is more necessary than ever in the past.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOGARTY. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. The other day we had a bill before this House under the guise of portal-to-portal, that constituted a serious attack upon the rights of labor, organized and unorganized, under the Fair Labor Standards Act, the Wage and Hour Act, the Bacon-Davis law, and the Walsh-Healey Act, and this is now being followed up by the Republican Party constituting a direct attack upon the working men and working women of this country.

Mr. FOGARTY. I thank the gentleman for his contribution. It reminds me of one of the witnesses who appeared before our committee.

He was the director of the American Federation of Labor from Kentucky. I remember in his closing remarks he said that he spoke as a Republican. I think the members of the committee will remember when I asked him, stating that being a laboring man and being a leader of organized labor in this country, and knowing something myself of labor unions I could never understand how any man who works for a living, let alone any member of a labor organization in this country could ever be a Republican or vote the Republican ticket in these United States of ours today.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOGARTY. I yield.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. And that was about the only remarks the gentleman from Rhode Island made during the entire hearings, was it not?

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOGARTY. I yield.

Mr. ROONEY. I would like to refer to the minutes of the hearings.

Mr. FOGARTY. I think I attended about every meeting they held and attended many meetings which the gentleman from Minnesota did not. I was trying to be a gentleman at all times, but the chairman and the gentleman from Minnesota took up so much time and made so many political speeches to all those who appeared before our committee and the prosecution never rested once in our committee in all of the 2 months these hearings were held.

Mr. ROONEY. And then struck them from the record.

Mr. FOGARTY. I just want to say that when the National Labor Relations Board came before our committee asking for funds they had a terrific backlog of accumulated cases. I think it is common knowledge that the work load of this Board increased greatly right after the cessation of hostilities.

The inability of the Board to get its cases cleared promptly and fairly resulted in many instances in uncertainty and doubt, both in the minds of management representatives and officers of labor unions. This uncertainty was galling to employees, and work stoppages resulted in a great many instances, stoppages which could have been avoided if the Board had adequate personnel to keep abreast of the incoming appeals. I think it was evident from the testimony presented at the committee hearings that the Board needed some help if it is to do the job Congress itself carved out for it. Yet, the committee recommends cutting the funds it requested by three and a half million dollars.

This Board, it should be remembered, has no control over the number of cases it will hear. It is the expressed will of Congress that this Board should settle industrial disputes wherever possible. It is to be expected and hoped that disputes will be taken to the Board before they get to the stage where a work stoppage is threatened. Yet, the majority party would prevent the Board from handling the cases of all who would seek consideration.

The present majority party also proposes amendments to the National Labor Relations Act which, if enacted, are bound to increase the work of the Board. One proposal suggests giving employers a right to appeal to the Board. Some suggest more intensive investigation by the Board.

But in the face of these proposals, instead of providing funds which are sorely needed to clean the slate of old cases, the committee recommends the Board be deprived of funds and so forces it to become more bogged down in the normal run of appeals.

This, clearly, is just the reverse of the kind of action necessary to promote industrial peace.

Perhaps the most startling action of the Appropriations Committee—at least to those who believe it is important that we try to prevent work stoppages—is the violent manhandling given the Conciliation Service of the Labor Department. This branch of the Department is practically washed up by the recommendations of the committee.

I have heard many people criticize various actions of Government agencies. With some of the criticisms I heartily agreed. But while all the attacks were being made on bureaucracy during recent years, there was always a good word for the Conciliation Service. In fact, during the war the chief criticism of the Government's activities in labor disputes centered around the fact that there were too many outfits handling labor problems and not enough freedom of action was given to the Conciliation Service.

Regardless of one's attitude on labor legislation, or unions, or management attitudes, it is a fact that the Conciliation Service has compiled a record that is brilliant. Not alone have the men of the Conciliation Service settled controversies in a fair and honest manner—but of far greater importance—they have been able to resolve differences of opinion between employer and employees before those differences resulted in the threat of a strike or lock-out. Here is an important and beneficial function of the Federal Government. This is a function which contributes in a tangible way to steady and sound productive effort in our industrial life. Under no circumstances should it be put to the ax as the committeee report proposes.

The hearing before the Appropriation Subcommittee set out in detail the number and type of cases which have been handled by the Conciliation Service. I recommend this portion of the hearings sincerely to all Members of the House who are interested in increased production through stable industrial relations.

Because of the work of the Conciliation Service almost all of the cases which are referred to it result in settlement without work stoppages. In the cases where work stoppages have occurred before the Conciliation Service came into the picture, solutions have been worked out and production resumed in short order.

The experience and reputation of the Conciliation Service is growing. The faith of employees and employers in this service is expanding. There is great work which the Service can do. It should be permitted and encouraged to play a leading role in preserving intelligent and harmonious industrial relations. If it is hamstrung at this juncture—as industry expends in the postwar era—our industrial life will suffer a severe jolt and this Congress will long regret the action it has taken.

As justification for the blow at the Conciliation Service criticism has been directed at the present Director, Mr. Warren. I do not know Mr. Warren personally and I don't think it is my province to defend him—or object to the criticisms made of his personal character. However, I do strongly object to the practice of throwing an individual out of a job through the devious method of cutting off the appropriation for his particular position. Whether that appropriation cut is honestly stated as a method of getting rid of a disliked Federal employee—or through the underhanded method of cloaking the move with the name of economy—it is bad business.

For many years the majority party here has objected violently to what it claimed was Executive interference in matters within the province of Legislature. Here is an example of the Legislature interfering with the Executive functions in a manner which is improper in the extreme.

I have always been of the belief that if a man is guilty of an offense he should be charged, he should be given an opportunity to defend himself against those charges. The Executive and Judicial branches of the Government have already demonstrated their willingness and ability to deal properly with the type of charges which have been leveled at the Director of the Conciliation Service.

The Congress has no right to brand him and banish him in the manner proposed under the appropriation for this Service. If this action of the committee is approved a dangerous precedent is being established.

The chairman of the committee in his presentation of his case today said they had made all of these cuts in the Department of Labor, but they had given practically everything the Public Health Service wanted and everything else along that line. He did not tell you that the committee has recommended this year in the Office of Vocational Rehabilitation, in my opinion one of the most essential functions of Government. Any person of employable age whose physical or mental handicap impairs his ability to find or hold a regular job is a potential client of this service.

The Office of Vocational Rehabilitation, as I remember, asked for approximately $20,000,000, which I will admit is more than they received in 1947, but the committee by some reasoning or other said: "We are going to cut you $1,750,000," for no rhyme or reason, but simply because of the feeling that they had made up their minds to cut everywhere they could whether there was any merit in the operation or not. They decided to cut one of the most essential organizations of this Government $1,750,000.

When you talk about the greatness of our country, when you talk about the money we are giving to help the people of other lands that they may enjoy the benefits of our system of government, does it not strike you that this vocational-rehabilitation program is a program which helps our own people to enjoy democracy? It is financed by our own people and enables those of our own people who have been unable to play their proper roles in our democratic system to take their places and opportunity in the ranks of the gainfully employed and carry their share of the load of maintaining our Government.

Seventy-five percent of those who were rehabilitated by this Office in 1946 were people who were unemployed at the time they first came within the consideration of this Office. Of the other 25 percent, most earned about $20 per week.

After rehabilitation the total annual earnings of the group amounted to $56,000,000—representing an increase of almost $45,000,000 in purchasing power. Remarkable in this record is the fact that only 9.3 percent of those rehabilitated were placed in unskilled jobs. Almost all were placed in professional, sales, service, and other similar skilled occupations.

Many of these individuals were taken from public-assistance rolls and made into tax-paying, productive citizens.

Many of them had dependents all of whom were supported by relatives, friends, or the community. Now they support themselves and their own and contribute their share to the support of those less fortunate than themselves.

Here is something good that is being done. Its results speak for themselves, and I submit the Office of Vocational Rehabilitation should be encouraged and supported generously.

Now we go on to the employment services. The United States Employment Service this year requested $6,500,000. The sum is slightly less than they had in 1947. The United States Employment Service is charged with the administration of two enactments of the Congress of the United States, one, the Wagner-Peyser Act of 1933, the other the Veterans' Employment Service provided by the Servicemen's Adjustment Act of 1944.

The committee provides almost seventy-two millions for grants to the States for public employment offices—because of the provisions of the Wagner-Peyser Act—but then reduces the funds of the Service for general administration and the Veterans' Placement Service by approximately $4,000,000. Of this sum $1,756,800 is earmarked for the Veterans' Placement Service—leaving $900,000 for general administration of the Employment Service.

This figure, $900,000, will provide little more than enough—if in fact there is enough—to merely dole out the funds provided for as State grants.

It will be impossible for the Service to conduct an inquiry into the compliance of the various States with the standards which have been set up for the protection of the Federal Government. It will not be possible for the Service to check the requests of the various States in order to determine the need and the use of the funds asked for.

It is the expressed will of Congress, through the Wagner-Peyser Act, that the United States Employment Service coordinate the activities of State employment agencies throughout the country. It is the expressed will of the Congress that the United States Employment Service supervise the allocation of funds to the various States—to guarantee they conform to certain definite standards. In the face of that directive from the Congress, the committee now recommends a 77-percent cut in the funds provided for the functioning of this service.

If the committee's recommendation is adopted by the Congress then it will be physicially impossible for the United States Employment Service to carry out this expressed will of the Congress. It will have all it can do to maintain a bookkeeping function to record which State gets how much and when.

In addition the Congress expressly provided for the Veterans' Placement Service within the framework of the Federal Government. This must have been because of the ability to cross State lines and artificial barriers between various regions. This Veterans' Placement Service is acknowledged as a valuable and vital function of the Federal Government. The record contains letters of Floyd F. Oleson, national commander of the DAV, and Louis E. Starr, commander in chief of the VFW, urging sympathetic consideration for this veterans' service. The budget for this service had already been cut close to half a million dollars when it came before the committee for consideration.

The Employment Service asked for $2,650,600 for this service to the veterans—not a hand-out, or a reward, or something for nothing, but an honest-to-goodness effort to help them fit themselves back into the productive life of the country, to help them regain their positions as wealth-producing, happy civilians. I believe this service is important. It is necessary. The last Congress acted in sound judgment in providing it. It should have the funds necessary to carry out the intent of the Seventy-ninth Congress—and this Congress—in continuing this legislation in effect.

However, the committee recommends a cut in its funds of 34 percent.

When Mr. Goodwin, Director of the United States Employment Service, was before our committee, I remember very distinctly how our generous chairman asked at that time how he could operate if we decided to cut him 25 percent. Mr. Goodwin, I will admit, at that time did not know as he could operate with any less than he asked for in his budget, and lo and behold when this committee appropriation bill was made public on last Friday, it was not anything like a 25-percent cut that was suggested in the committee hearings, but it was a cut of 77 percent over what they had in 1947. Another worthwhile program which takes a severe cut under the committee's recommendation is the tuberculosis-control work of the Public Health Service. Almost half a million dollars is taken away at a time when the program is in need of expansion and development.

Now, I have a sanitarium within a few miles of my home. I have an occasion to visit that sanitarium time and time again, and I know that tuberculosis up to this point in our history has not been stopped; that when a program like this has been started we should give them all the money that they ask for to stamp out that terrible disease. But, no, the majority on this committee said, "No, let us cut them, too; let us take away four or five hundred thousand dollars from them," and that is what actually happened in this committee, cutting the appropriation for tuberculosis down four-hundred-and-some-thousand dollars.

While economy is a fine and necessary thing—this is no place to start practicing this kind of saving. The money spent in this program is money invested in the well-being of the citizens of the Republic. It is not a coddling program by any stretch of the imagination. Its work is essential and like the Vocational Rehabilitation Service it achieves results which enhance the Federal Treasury through the strength and ability of healthy, productive citizens.

In these times when all of us want industrial peace your party is asking the Congress to enact new labor legislation, yet you give no consideration, as members of the Committee on Appropriations, to what is absolutely essential to the administration of present laws. To enact legislation of this sort is not in the interest of the country. Why, it was testified before us by the National Labor Relations Board, by members of that Board, that if some of these proposed bills that are now resting in the House Labor Committee and the Senate committee are passed and made into law, then it is going to create more work. But that did not have anything to do with the economy minds of our committee. They said they did not care, saying "We are going to cut you anyhow."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the words objected to.

The Clerk read as follows:

* * * * *

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may withdraw those words.

Mr. CHURCH. They are subject to a point of order, Mr. Chairman, but I shall not insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Rhode Island?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON].

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair regrets that the request is not in order at this time, as the time is under the control of the gentleman from New York and is restricted under the rules of the House.

Mrs. NORTON. Is it not possible to get that additional time by unanimous consent? I have known it to be done in many, many other cases.

The CHAIRMAN. That would be true under the 5-minute rule, but we are proceeding now in general debate, and under the rules of the House that is not permitted.

Mrs. NORTON. I do not want to question the authority of the Chair, but I recall two or three occasions when additional time was granted in general debate by unanimous consent.

Mr. Chairman, I have been absent from the House during the past 10 days suffering from a throat infection, but I have come here today against orders to plead with you to stop, look and listen before you adopt this bill. The economy ax has been wantonly slung at the Labor Department appropriations. There are many parts of the bill to which I am opposed, but time will not permit me to go into all of them. My very great concern is the Division of Labor Standards. I want it understood by the chairman and the committee that I am not carried away by propaganda or politics. It is a matter of deep conviction. I know whereof I speak and I am speaking from a full heart.

I do not see how the Labor Department can operate with the budget allotted. Apparently in their antilabor drive the Republicans do not want to see it operate. They not only want to strangle labor by ill-conceived labor legislation but now they propose to murder the agencies that are in a position to give labor assistance in meeting its responsibilities. They wish to take the life out of the Labor Department services to the States and to the public that will eliminate the abuses of our industrial system.

Gentlemen, you talk about eliminating communism in this country. Within a short period we will appropriate millions to ferret Communists out of the Government. I am all for it and believe this should be done. But that is not enough. I am also for seeing that we do not create the atmosphere and distress in this country in which communism grows and thrives. This bill we are considering today in its obviously unfair attack on the arm of the Government which deals with workers has in it all the seeds that make for communism and fascism. By slashing the Labor Department 40 to 50 percent at the same time that we give a 1-percent cut to the Post Office, 10 percent to the Treasury, and up the present appropriations of some agencies in Federal Security, the Republicans show clearly where they are leading us. The discrimination is clear.

I warn you that this Congress will have something to answer for if it destroys the Labor Department in this ruthless and vindictive fashion.

Take the Division of Labor Standards—a small unit in the Labor Department set up primarily to help the States improve working conditions. I know this Division well because, as chairman of the House Labor Committee, I frequently called on them for information on all types of problems that were up for discussion.

The Republicans were not satisfied in curtailing the work of this Division, they eliminated it entirely. The reasons given in the report certainly do not convince me. Take the comment on accident prevention, a field in which the Division has performed a remarkable service for the country, saving thousands of lives and billions of dollars, with its trifling appropriation of $136,000. The committee says industrial safety is a field in which States have supreme authority. We all agree with that. There are plenty of other fields in which the States have supreme authority, but we do not deny funds to the Federal Government to assist States in carrying on these other functions. In fact, every branch of State Government, except the labor department, gets Federal funds or Federal services so that they may do a better job. We give millions to the Office of Education for aid to States in vocational education. Think of the millions we give to agriculture for aid to the States. In this bill before us it is proposed to give $116,000,000 to the Public Health Service, mostly for aid to the States. There are some hundreds of millions to the Federal Security for aid to the States and yet the committee says, and I quote:

> That inasmuch as industrial safety must be accomplished by State law that any efforts of the Federal Government in this field are gratuities extended to the States and can safely be discontinued until some future period.

Gentlemen, I ask you, why is assistance to the States in saving the lives of workers a gratuity when similar assistance to the States for protecting bees and birds and cattle is a necessity?

Let us look facts squarely in the face. The committee had more than economy in mind when it made this report. Let me point out that in the appropriation it made grants to the States for vocational rehabilitation, which as it says, "have for their purpose the restoration to employable capacity of persons injured in industry." They up the amount available this year by $6,000,000, to a total of $18,000,000. Who is paying for industrial accidents if not the taxpayers of the United States? How long are we going to spend $18,000,000 a year to rehabilitate people that have been injured in industry and cut out a measily $136,000 to help the States to stop these accidents before they occur? For the life of me I cannot understand the reasoning of the Republicans on the House Labor Committee. I am sure the taxpayers will not understand it either.

In abolishing the Division of Labor Standards the Appropriations Committee has performed another feat which, if approved by this House, will live forever in infamy. I wish to speak—with all the power of my voice—with all the conviction of my heart—on behalf of the innocent victims of this measure. For their voices are small and still—they cannot speak for themselves. They cannot even vote, gentlemen. They are the children of America—our Nation's proudest and most cherished possession—our youth, our future citizens.

Under the false mask of economy you will nullify the most basic purpose of government, to protect and promote the welfare of children, to regulate child labor, and to develop employment and educational opportunity for America's youth.

Mr. Chairman, a ruthless hand has drawn this appropriation bill. A ruthless hand has slashed the child-labor agency in the Labor Department's Division of Labor Standards. It has transferred part of its function to the Wage and Hour Division of the Labor Department. That child-labor agency was created 35 years ago as a part of the Children's Bureau by the act of a Republican Congress and by the signature of a Republican President, the Honorable William Howard Taft.

That Republican Congress knew the need to prohibit the labor of little children. That Republican Congress knew the need to stamp out sweatshops. That Republican Congress knew the need for a Federal agency to help the States and community groups raise the age at which society allows its youth to work, lengthen the years during which its children learn to live, learn to work, learn to play, learn to become worthy future citizens of a democracy. That Congress knew the need to find out what kind of jobs are safe for our youth, what kind are dangerous to their health, stunting to their minds, deadening to their souls.

Subsequent Congresses, with both Republican and Democratic majorities, knew the need for this kind of an agency and supported it with funds down through the years. Last July, when the Children's Bureau was transferred to the Federal Security Agency, the child-labor and youth-employment functions went to the Division of Labor Standards. But it is the same function that Congresses since 1912 have supported. What omniscience does this Congress possess that justifies its elimination? What possible emergency justifies the saving of a paltry $330,000 at the expense of the Nation's most precious asset, its youth? It cannot be that any Member of this Congress believes that agency's work is done, that there is no more child labor in this land, no more exploitation of the young in hazardous jobs, that all the children who can profit from more schooling are docilely sitting behind their desks. Have you no idea of the debt we owe to the children of America—of the responsibility we assumed when many of their fathers lost their lives in attempting to bring freedom and happiness to the world? Can you dare to shirk your sworn obligation to the children of America, particularly in this time of great juvenile delinquency, in order to save a few hundred thousand dollars? Or, is this necessary because you have promised a 30 and 20 percent tax reduction this year? How can you square your conscience with such figure juggling? Or perhaps you do not know how many children are working in America today. I will give you a few facts. Actually there are two and one-half times as many youngsters working today as in 1940 and a million less are in high school than in 1941. This increase in child labor stems from the war. But much of the child-labor problem in this country stems from our complacence and our indifference. We have a 16-year minimum age under the Fair Labor Standards Act. We generally accept a 16-year minimum as desirable for State laws.

We sit back and boast of the highest standard of living on earth; we smile with condescension and say, oh yes, in the last century, we had lots of child-labor-sweatshop conditions—but not today. My friends, the Fair Labor Standards Act protects less than half the children of America. Only 14 States have a 16-year minimum age for factory work. Only 4 States prohibit all employment of children under 16 during school hours. If we marked these States in white on a map and marked the rest black do you realize that most of you would be living today in black States? States that do not have a 16-year minimum age for factory work and for all work during school hours?

Oh no, this Republican Congress cannot claim it is abolishing the child-labor and youth-employment branch of the Division of Labor Standards because its work is done. And it will satisfy no one seriously concerned for the welfare of children to transfer some of these functions of the Wage and Hour Division of the Department of Labor. Yes, this child-labor agency also administers the child-labor provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act. But it does many other things, as I have said, on behalf of the majority of our children, who are not protected by the Fair Labor Standards Act. And the Congress which passed the Fair Labor Standards Act decided after extended deliberation and consideration of various alternatives that it did not want the Wage and Hour Division even to administer the child-labor provisions of this act. I ought to know the legislative history and intent of the Congress which gave far more extended consideration to this problem than the present Congress has had time to give. I was chairman of the committee which deliberated over many versions—all of which used the accumulated experience and skill of the then Children's Bureau in some way to enforce the child-labor provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act. The final version placed all responsibility for their administration in the Children's Bureau.

That Congress knew that an enforcement agency like the Wage and Hour Division required to check employers' pay rolls was not equipped to do research on hazardous jobs for youngsters. That Congress knew that wage-hour inspectors—accountants, if you please—would not be equipped to work with State administrators and women's groups and labor and community organizations in developing better State child-labor standards. That Congress knew that wage-hour accountants would not be equipped to negotiate agreements with 44 States by which the Federal Government accepts as valid proof of age, State age, and work certificates. Yet these Federal-State agreements prevent a complete duplication of Federal certificates and save employers time, money, and irritation.

That Congress made these wise decisions because it had studied the problems for months. What facts had this Congress to controvert the decisions of its predecessor? A small House appropriations subcommittee has perforce given this matter the most superficial examination during the last 6 weeks or so. If this Congress overturns its predecessor's long-debated and deliberated determination, it will not be on the merits of the question. This Congress will be playing politics with its future generations. Is that what you want to do?

The majority in this Congress insist they received the people's mandate last November to economize in government. We Democrats are as interested as anybody else in true economy. But we don't think you Republicans received any mandate to exploit America's future citizens. The American people did not give you a mandate to recreate the sweatshops of the nineteenth century. They gave you no mandate to condemn their 12- and 14-year-olds to long hours, night work, back-breaking toil for starvation wages, hazards of life and limb, to early contact with the seamy side of life. They gave you no mandate to deprive their children of a chance to learn to work and to live and to develop to the height of their capacity. They gave you no mandate to deny their children the proudest heritage of America.

Nor did the people give you a mandate to deprive men and women workers of a chance to work safely in the factories and shops of America. They did not give you a mandate to save a few thousands at the expense of millions to American industry and labor. They did not give you a mandate to economize by turning the economic clock back to the nineteenth century. The Gallup poll has already confirmed what I say, gentlemen. It has already confirmed the people's discontent with your 2 months of stewardship. A vote for this appropriation bill as it stands will boomerang just as the other things you've done in the last 2 months. Or don't you want to profit from experience? Have you challenged your conscience in this matter, and are you prepared to defend before the judgment seat of God cutting down the appropriations necessary to protect the children of America and at the same time give to the taxpayers of America a present of something around $4,000,000,000? Oh, yes, we all would like to have our income taxes reduced, but not at the expense of America's children, nor by reducing the funds in the Labor Department, which have to do with accident prevention and other important functions of Government. Think it over, my colleagues, and I beg you to put back in your bill the $330,000. It may mean the difference between helping hundreds of thousands of American children, or their loss to the wealthiest Nation in all the world.

Mr. Chairman, it was my privilege to devote many of the best years of my life to child welfare work, and I am making this appeal to you from personal knowledge of the subject gained long before I came to Congress or knew anything about politics. Having had this knowledge, I consider it my duty to place this matter in your hands. Having worked with you for 22 years, I have confidence in your judgment, particularly when the question is one concerning human values.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Minnesota rise?

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. CANFIELD].

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, several misleading and unfounded statements have appeared in the press in recent days regarding lay-offs by the Bureau of Customs as a result of the Treasury Department appropriation bill recently passed by the House with a unanimous vote.

Dismissals of personnel engaged in protecting the customs revenues and providing services to importers could result, under this bill, only from maladministration on the part of the Bureau of the Customs. Sufficient funds are provided so that Customs can retain every single employee engaged in port activities, such as collectors, inspectors, port-patrol officers, appraisers, comptrollers, and surveyors.

The bill passed by the House contains $32,500,000 for the Bureau of Customs for salaries and expenses. This is $3,150,000 more than was available to Customs in 1947. This belies the statement that the bill is an open invitation to smugglers and dangerously imperils the revenues from customs.

It is true that the House cut the 1948 Customs estimates by $3,500,000. A further cut, in considerable amount, could have been made before it became necessary to dismiss any port employees. In asking an increase of $6,650,000 for 1948 the Bureau of Customs requested $1,668,186 for new and additional employees. It asked for $1,172,061 for Customs Agency Service abroad, which in the opinion of the committee, after receiving testimony, could well be handled by regular attachés of the Foreign Service. Since Attorney General Tom Clark recommended that the border patrol of the Immigration and Naturalization Service and the Customs could be merged without impairment of duties the committee felt that only half of the $1,543,259 requested for patrols on the Canadian and Mexican borders was sufficient. These figures add up to $3,611,877, or $111,877 more than was cut from the estimates.

It is entirely possible for Customs to make further savings, thus adding some personnel to port work, and without curtailing any vital service, by eliminating some of the comptrollers of customs, some of the Customs Information Exchange personnel, some of the temporary field employees, some of the "when actually employed" people, some of the temporary day labor, some of the overtime and night work. By careful and efficient administration some savings can be made in other expenses, shown here with the amount requested for each: Travel, $259,000; transportation of things, $400,000; communications, $250,000; rents and utility services, $250,000; contractual services, $271,000; supplies and materials, $305,000; equipment, $502,000; and securing evidence, $60,000.

If port services are impaired, if smuggling increases, and if customs revenues are not maintained, the fault will lie with the officials of the Bureau of Customs and Congress must hold them responsible.

Mr. HAVENNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANFIELD. I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HAVENNER. I have just received a telegram from the mayor of San Francisco in which he stated that he had been informed that as a result of the passage of the appropriation bill the Customs Service at San Francisco would necessarily be reduced to a point where the service would be crippled.

Will the gentleman tell me how I can reply to him?

Mr. CANFIELD. I have just made the answer that should be given. If the gentleman will send my statement as it will appear in the RECORD tomorrow, the mayor will have his complete answer: That this crippling is entirely unnecessary. It is done because the Bureau of the Customs does not want to have a dollar taken off their 1948 estimates. Yet we have given them $3,150,000 more than they had in 1947.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH].

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, we have before us today a bill making appropriations for the Department of Labor, the Federal Security Agency, and related independent agencies for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1948. This is the third appropriation bill presented by our Committee on Appropriations to the House. In each bill reported the committee has made substantial reductions in the funds requested by the Administration, and those reductions have been made without in any way interfering with the essential functions of the departments and agencies involved.

We promised the people a reduction in Government expenditures and a reduction in the number of people on the Federal pay roll. We promised the people a balanced budget and relief from the burden of taxes. We promised an elimination of a costly, wasteful, and oppressive bureaucracy and its unnecessary restrictions and controls. This bill is in partial fulfillment of those promises. It is part of our program to put this Government on a sound financial basis and to take this Government out of the hands of petty bureaucrats and return it to the people.

For the past 14 years we have seen the public debt steadily mount, and taxes become more and more burdensome. Money was spent for all kinds of experiments and without regard as to how it might be raised. All manner of new agencies and new bureaus and new boards and new offices were created. The Federal pay roll steadily grew. According to the most recent report of the so-called Byrd committee during the month of December 1946, there were 1,987,808 persons employed by the Federal Government.

The days of "blank check" appropriations, experimentation, and broad delegations of power to the executive branch of the Government have come to an end. We are determined that every expenditure be fully justified and that every law clearly express the intent of Congress. We are also determined that the laws be administered in accordance with the intent of Congress and not in accordance with what some bureaucrat might think the law should be.

With this as our objective, the Subcommittee on the Department of Labor, on which I am privileged to serve under the able chairmanship of the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE], carefully analyzed every item in the budget. I should like to say that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE] conducted the hearings of our subcommittee with unusual ability. If you read through the two volumes of printed hearings, you cannot but be impressed with the orderly and fair manner in which our chairman developed the facts concerning the operations and needs of each agency. He was thorough. He was firm, but always fair. It has, indeed, been a great privilege to serve under his chairmanship.

The bill carries appropriations for the Department of Labor, the Federal Security Agency, the National Labor Relations Board, the National Mediation Board, and Railroad Retirement Board. The amount of money provided in the bill for these agencies is $77,825,520 less than the budget estimates. In making this reduction we have carefully examined every single item, and we are convinced that the reductions recommended by our committee can be carried out without impairment of the essential activities. Indeed, with the elimination of the unnecessary activities, the wholly superfluous positions and personnel, the agencies themselves will be able to carry on their essential work with a greater degree of efficiency.

For the fiscal year 1948 the committee made a rather substantial reduction in the appropriation for the Department of Labor. The bill allows $90,864,200 for the Labor Department, of which $71,728,000 is for grants to the States for the public employment offices. In other words, the bill would give the Department of Labor $19,136,200 for its operations, which is 40 percent below the comparable budget estimate and 40 percent below 1947 appropriations.

This reduction was not arbitrary. It was made, as I said before, only after the most painstaking analysis of each and every activity, each and every office, and each and every budget item. Doubtless certain activities, which we have seen fit to curtail, have certain value to the country. But in order to economize we must make a distinction between what is necessary, that which is essential, and what is a luxury. It is no doubt possible to find some justification for practically every item in the budget. Every one of us as individuals could readily justify for ourselves a larger home, a larger automobile and a more complete wardrobe. But we simply cannot afford it. There are many things each of us would like to have, which could perhaps add to our comfort and happiness. When we do not have the income to pay for them we do without, and to be economical and frugal we purchase only that which we find necessary and can afford. That is precisely the approach the committee has made in its consideration of the different items. We have kept what is essential and have eliminated the others.

For salaries in the immediate office of the Secretary of Labor, the budget recommends an appropriation of $1,190,000. In the bill we have allowed $819,500. In reaching this decision we have inquired into the operations of the office, and, in my opinion, at least, the amount allowed by the committee is more than ample. The office seems to me to be filled with subfunctionaries who may be helpful but totally unnecessary. There are, in my view, too many assistants to the assistant to the assistant, not only in the Department of Labor, but in all departments and agencies of the Government.

A substantial reduction was also made in the office of the Solicitor. The Budget recommends $1,251,000 for this office, but the committee reduced the amount to $755,300. As explained in our report, with the reduction in practically every other appropriation for the Department, there should be less legal work required. And aside from that, I have long been convinced that if the legal offices of the Government were run more efficiently, if the personnel was obliged to do a full day's work, fewer lawyers would be required.

The committee has made a very substantial reduction of $1,117,100 below the budget or 30 percent below the comparable 1947 amount, for traveling expenses. And we have made a 20 percent reduction in the amount allowed for printing and binding. There has always been a tendency on the part of Government employees to use every ostensible excuse to make a trip here or there at Government expense, when a telephone call, or a telegram, or a letter would serve the purpose of obtaining the information that might be sought. I have talked with many businessmen, and they will tell you that they have had numerous visits to their office or plant from Government employees for the most inconsequential reason. It is not uncommon for someone to decide that he would like to spend a week end in New York, Chicago, or Kansas City, and to manufacture some excuse for making the trip on official business. There must be closer control over travel on the part of Federal employees.

It is hardly necessary to speak of the savings that can be made in the elimination of the great bulk of printing that is done by the departments and agencies. To be sure, some of it is very necessary and very important. But also a great amount of it has been waste. We know for a fact that during recent years agency after agency issues great streams of propaganda.

When Miss Frances Perkins was Secretary of Labor she established the Division of Labor Standards. It was supposed to serve as a clearing house in the field of industrial safety and sanitation. But, like so many other divisions throughout the Federal Government, it gradually expanded its functions, and entered into the fields of labor education and labor legislation.

We have provided no funds whatever for this Division other than those transferred as indicated in the report. We are now convinced that there has been a duplication of the work of this division with the Bureau of Labor Statistics and the Wage and Hour Division. For years the Wage and Hour Division has performed the inspection service necessary to the enforcement of the child-labor law, and in transferring certain funds to that division we have consolidated all functions related to child-labor provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act. And it is our opinion that no useful purpose is served by having a group of Federal employees gratuitously duplicating work by helping States in the administration of their safety and sanitation laws. That is a matter that can be left to the States, to insurance companies and private organizations.

I should like to call special attention to the amount allowed by the committee for the United States Conciliation Service. We have here an example of what has been taking place in this great Federal bureaucracy. It is not only an example of how the agencies grow year after year, but it is also an example of how the intent of Congress is deliberately ignored.

As you know, the Secretary of Labor is empowered to act as a mediator in industrial disputes and he can appoint Commissioners of Conciliation for that purpose. In 1938 this unit received an appropriation in the amount of $273,000. It steadily grew, and in 1945 it received $493,000. But in the year 1946 the sum of $504,350 was specifically appropriated for the Conciliation Service. However, in that year it also received under the heading "National defense" an additional $1,992,500. Thus, for the year 1946, the sum of $2,496,850 was made available to this Service. In 1947 the appropriation amounted to $2,301,746, and for the year 1948 they requested the sum of $2,678,400. As pointed out in our report, the Service proposes to continue to receive in its regular appropriation substantially all the sums it previously received under the heading of "National defense."

Not only has the Service expanded beyond all reason, but we discovered that the Director of the Service, Mr. Edgar L. Warren, dismissed 39 conciliators in the field in order that he could hire at high salaries his friends and acquaintances with whom he served on the late War Labor Board. In order to obtain the ablest men possible for the field service in this important work, Congress waived the civil-service restrictions for the field. Mr. Warren was thus able to take care of his friends and colleagues, without having to care about Civil Service, by appointing them to the field as conciliators, but actually having them serve in the department where they did not serve as conciliators at all.

As characterized by our committee, this was a definite fraud. People were designated as conciliators without any intention that they ever serve in that capacity, and their salaries were charged to the field, where Civil Service approval was not required, although they performed services in the department, where Civil Service approval would be required.

I have no doubt but that other instances of this very same thing will be uncovered as we proceed with a close scrutiny of the operations of the various departments and agencies. I have no doubt that every kind of scheme, device, and subterfuge has been employed by the bureaucrats to realize the highest possible salary and to circumvent the intent of Congress. As stated by the committee "this action in itself represents conduct in an executive officer that cannot be tolerated."

And there is this additional fact: Mr. Warren has a record of membership in Communist-front organizations. He at one time advocated that Government employees have the right to strike against the Government. But since the election of this Republican Congress, it is no longer popular to hold such radical beliefs, and Mr. Warren naturally claims that he has changed his mind on the subject. That, however, is what they will all claim. It is in keeping with the communistic methods.

It is a known fact that the New Deal protected and coddled the communistic elements in the Federal service. Every attempt we made to have them removed was obstructed. This Congress intends to deal with this problem. It is a significant fact that now that the administration recognizes how determined the Republican majority in Congress is to get rid of all Communists, fellow travelers, and all other radical elements from the Government, the Executive has decided to take some steps to meet that demand. Mr. Warren is a case in point. He should be dismissed from the responsible position he holds.

Before concluding I should like to say a brief word with respect to the appropriation carried in this bill for the National Labor Relations Board. The amount allowed by the committee is $3,950,300 less than the budget estimates. The Board claimed before our committee that it should have increased appropriations because its work load and backlog has been growing. An important point to bear in mind is that when the Board refers to its backlog of cases, it classifies each craft of a given company as a separate case. In other words, it is the same thing as classifying each subsidiary of a corporation as a separate case although the corporation is really a unit. The Board's figures are misleading.

Moreover, it is my conviction that if the Board would confine its work to administration of the law itself and refrain from all manner of extracurricular activities, it would be able to discharge its functions with greater efficiency. Instead of promoting industrial peace, the Board has actually created industrial warfare.

Whatever might be the opinion of the members of the Committee on Appropriations with respect to the National Labor Relations Board, we could not abolish it by refusing to appropriate money for it. So long as the National Labor Relations Act is on the statute books, our Committee on Appropriations is obliged to supply funds for its enforcement. It is the function of the Committee on Education and Labor to determine what labor legislation shall be brought before the House. That there is a great need for remedial labor legislation, there should not be the slightest doubt on the part of any fair-minded person. And I am confident that the members of the Committee on Education and Labor will shortly report a bill for that purpose. This is one of our major problems. The people look to us for a sound solution.

Mr. Chairman, there are several other items in the bill that I would like to discuss, but time precludes. Suffice it to say that the committee has made every possible reduction in the expenditures of the department and agencies involved in this particular appropriation bill. It must be recognized that included in the bill are considerable sums for public health and welfare programs, such as old-age pensions, which we could not possibly reduce without changes made in the basic legislation. In my judgment, and I hope in the judgment of the House, the committee has done a thorough job in meeting a very difficult situation, and we have been able to accomplish substantial savings without interfering with any essential functions.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 25 minutes, and at 4 o'clock I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for 25 minutes.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Chairman, we have heard much wailing and gnashing of teeth here today about what is proposed to be done to the Department of Labor by this bill. What are the facts?

Let us look into the record and try to dispel some of the fog and gloom dispensed by left-wing newspapers and columnists.

May I call to your attention that we have been very liberal with this particular department upon the basis of a peacetime year. Let us go back to 1941 and see what was the comparable amount of money given to this entire department for the same functions which it exercises today, and also let us add to that particular amount 25 percent to take care of the various pay increases since that time. What do we find? In 1941 the Department of Labor received $14,630,000 for functions for which we are giving them $19,000,000 for the year 1948. Is that being niggardly? In 1942 the same Department of Labor received for these very same bureaus and functions from a Democrat-controlled Congress, $16,500,000 in comparison to the $19,000,000 that this Republican-controlled committee in Congress is willing to give them for this coming year. Yes; in 1943 this Labor Department only had $16,000,000, $3,000,000 less than our committee is willing to accord to them for their operation this coming fiscal year. Some people are not aware of the fact that the war is over.

It makes me sick and tired, Members of the House, to see certain Members get into this well and make assertions which are, to say the least, difficult to substantiate by facts. When I see the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROONEY], in the first place, attempt to ridicule the majority members of this subcommittee for not making severe enough cuts and then, on the other hand, get up here and bemoan the fact that we did not allow each and every item that the Bureau of the Budget demanded. I question his consistency. May I ask of you people on the right who oppose the action of this subcommittee, if you want us to cut the crippled children's appropriation? Do you want us to cut the cancer research? No, on the other hand, we in control of this subcommittee saw fit to increase the cancer research by $6,000,000. Yes, we looked through each and every little item in this bill and found certain jobs that we could take out and set aside, and in place of those particular jobs, in addition to the $27,000,000 which we actually did save below the budget request, we inserted this $6,000,000 for cancer research and overrode the administration's budget request for that very important work.

I wonder if the gentleman from Rhode Island and the gentleman from New York and the gentlewoman from New Jersey want us to prevent the expenditure of a sufficient amount for cancer research to take care of that great problem that is the scourge of mankind, killing more people than any other disease in America.

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. I refuse to yield at this point.

Mr. ROONEY. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Not at this point. The gentleman is just attempting to get me off of the trend of my thought, but he will not succeed.

Mr. ROONEY. I assure the gentleman I have no such intention.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. I will yield later.

Yes; they come in here and try to make you believe, in the face of all this evidence, that we have been bad; that we have been mean to labor, whereas we have increased the appropriation to the Department of Labor by at least 25 percent over the first three years in which this great country of ours was engaged in war. Labor itself has a very great stake in a balanced budget, and must take its share of reductions in governmental expense.

The gentlewoman from New Jersey had something to say relative to the Children's Bureau and how we were killing it. But, the gentlewoman does not say that we transferred a considerable amount of money over to the Wage and Hour Division from the Bureau of Fair Labor Standards and that, in addition to what is in the Wage and Hour Division, gives ample funds for the enforcement of child-labor laws.

I ask my chairman the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE] if that is not a true statement?

Mr. KEEFE. It is, and I have listened with great concern to the remarks made by the gentlewoman from New Jersey, who ought to know better. Evidently her speech was made in ignorance of the action of this committee, because all of the functions that were left in the Labor Department, when the Children's Bureau was transferred to the Federal Security Agency, have been transferred to the Wage and Hour Division. The statement she makes is a charge that the Wage and Hour Division of the Department of Labor is not able and does not have the capacity to carry out these functions. She makes that statement despite the fact that the record shows that the Secretary of Labor himself stated that he intended to transfer these functions to the Wage-Hour Division just as soon as the Division moved back to Washington. In view of these facts, I ask the gentleman what becomes of this argument of the gentlewoman from New Jersey, who talks about the necessity for protecting children.

The gentleman from Minnesota and I have served on this committee for a number of years. This is my seventh year on that committee. The head of the Children's Bureau, Katharine Lenroot, and Dr. Eliot, her assistant, will have to give testimony to the fact that we have supported and urged the continuation and enlargement of the Children's Bureau every year they have come before this subcommittee for their appropriation. I am astounded that the gentlewoman from New Jersey would have the audacity to place in this RECORD a statement that has so little substance in fact as it refers to the action of this committee in reference to the Children's Bureau.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CHURCH. Perhaps the gentleman will excuse the gentlewoman from New Jersey because she in her statement said she was here against doctor's orders. She mentioned her health. She has not been here for weeks. Therefore, she could easily be mistaken because of lack of knowledge of the facts involved.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. That I believe would be charitable.

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman let me make an observation at this point?

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. I do not yield at this point.

We have heard the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROONEY] on the floor of the House this afternoon try to make you believe that what we have done to the Conciliation Service will ruin it. Let us go into the history of this service for just a few minutes and show just what this committee has done, and you will see whether the majority of this committee is desirous of ruining the Conciliation Service.

Back in 1938, the record shows, the Conciliation Service had for all purposes only $273,000; in 1939 $283,000; 1940 to 1943, the highest amount in any one year was $449,000. Even in 1946 the total for that service was merely $504,000. In 1946 the Congress jumped that appropriation up to $2,300,000, which with the pay increase amounting to $296,000, made a total of $2,596,000 available for the present fiscal year.

I feel that when this committee allocates to this service, in a year in which we are at peace, in a year in which labor troubles have died down, $2,080,000, four times the amount they received in 1943, 1944, and 1945, we certainly cannot be accused of trying to ruin them. I think the opposition's argument is ridiculous.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin, who is probably the best informed Member in Congress upon the labor and Federal security functions of our Government.

Mr. KEEFE. The evidence in this case clearly shows a very rapidly declining case load, does it not?

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Certainly.

Mr. KEEFE. Instead of being an expanding service, as the gentlemen on the other side would have the public believe, their work load has very materially decreased right along.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. That is correct.

Mr. Chairman, let me bring out this fact. Whether or not Mr. Warren was a member of subversive organizations in years gone by, and he did admit such to be the case, we would have cut this service at least the same amount without his being in the picture. To me he is just incidental. We are not cutting the Conciliation Service because the Administration refuses to put in at the head of that Service a man whose loyalty to the American Government and to the American people is unquestioned. As the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE] has told you, we gave opportunity to the Secretary of Labor to get rid of this man. We felt that whether or not he was a Communist, his past associations show that there was ground for belief that he was. In the Bureau of Conciliation, particularly, can the American people afford to have a man with any suspicion attached to him? If there is taint in connection with his name by his past associations, whether that be proved or not, we cannot afford to take the chance and put over this great Conciliation Service, this organization which attempts to keep labor peace throughout America, a man who has admitted publicly that he has been a member of subversive organizations and who has admitted that he thinks it perfectly all right for the employees of the Federal Government to strike.

On that particular point I wish the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE] would corroborate me. Did he not?

Mr. KEEFE. The gentleman is absolutely right. The gentleman now speaking read into the record the questions and answers relating to that. May I not call attention of the gentleman and the Members of the House to the fact that it was the party line of the Communist outfit to support the war effort in every way from the time that Hitler attacked Russia. So we find our Communist sympathizers and our actual Communists all over the country not trying to destroy the war effort but giving every aid to the war effort because we were sending the supplies that our Soviet friends so badly needed—everyone knows that was the party line.

Mr. ROONEY. Would my distinguished friend from Minnesota yield for a question?

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Certainly, I yield to the gentleman because he was kind enough to yield to me previously.

Mr. ROONEY. Is it not a fact that Mr. Warren, head of the Conciliation Service, was tried on the very same charges before the United States Civil Service Commission and also was investigated by either the Secret Service or the FBI? Is that not a matter of fact and does not the record show that?

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. I understand there is no record to that effect. Is that a correct statement, Mr. KEEFE?

Mr. KEEFE. The gentleman is absolutely correct. Mr. Warren made the statement when he was before the committee that he had been cleared by the FBI and the Civil Service Commission. But when I asked him the question, "Have you been cleared by the FBI?" he said, "I do not know about that. I do not know about the FBI, but I had a hearing before the Civil Service Commission and was cleared." I may say in answer to the distinguished gentleman that he had the opportunity to bring that record before the committee. It was not brought before the committee but it will be brought before someone before this appropriation bill is finally enacted into law. I think it will be interesting to see what that Civil Service Commission trial, to which the gentleman from Brooklyn refers, really was.

Mr. ROONEY. I think the gentleman from Oshkosh is incorrectly stating the facts.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Chairman, in the time remaining I want to go into a problem which I think has been disregarded and thrown aside as something not worth while by the Democratic administration which has been in control of our subcommittee for a good many years past. I refer to Freedmen's Hospital. Ladies and gentlemen of the House, if these so-called liberals who are in the House care to investigate something, they might go into this question of Freedmen's Hospital and Howard University. They might examine those institutions with friendly interest. They might go out there as our subcommittee did and see, for example, the garbage room, just 30 or 40 feet away from where the ice is cracked for the use of the patients of the hospital. Yes; you might see that the rats can go into that garbage and from there, a few feet farther on, to the floor where this ice is prepared for human beings. Yes; I would suggest they could go down into the basement and see that damp hole, where the hospital had, until recently, prepared the milk for the babies of the hospital. I know these children have skins which are dark, but nevertheless, as far as I am concerned, they are children; and, as far as I am concerned, the colored people are just as much entitled in the District of Columbia to decent hospital facilities as are the whites.

Yes; you might go out there as we did and go up into the ward where they keep little children from 2 to 16 years of age of both sexes. You might ask the nurses as we did whether they had sufficient help and why the floors were in the condition that they were. We did not like the dirt that was all too evident. The nurses told us and the Public Health Service told us that where they were supposed to have five nurses to take care of that particular ward during a 24-hour period and where they were supposed in addition to have three custodians working there during that same 24-hour period, eight people in all should be working there, under the present circumstances due to the small allocations they have received from past administrations they have only three nurses to take care of that particular ward. Conditions throughout this hospital showed a pitiful lack of ordinary necessities needed for decent hospitalization. A startling lack of personnel makes me realize just what caused the deaths of more than a dozen babies last summer at Freedmen's. We have decided to make this hospital a decent institution and have acted accordingly.

In this particular bill we have jumped the budget about half a million dollars for this purpose. I did not look for any saving at that point. I did not look for any saving when it came to trying to find out how to root out this evil of cancer. We upped the budget in cancer research $6,000,000. Nor did we look for any savings in the control of venereal diseases throughout the Nation. There again we overrode the judgment of the noninfallible and nonsacrosanct budget and furnished to the rapid treatment centers approximately $400,000 so that we would not have to close those particular centers for a part of the time during this year.

Our committee is entitled to credit for these actions—and when I say our committee, naturally, I must give the bulk of this credit to the majority of the committee because after all we are accused by the minority of anything that goes wrong. So, for anything that is right, we will also take the credit just as we are accorded the abuse for what some think wrong. We looked all through this bill to find places where there were unnecessary jobs so that we could find this $6,000,000 for cancer, $400,000 for control of venereal diseases, and $500,000 for Freedman's Hospital. Of course, that made our savings balance on the entire bill look bad. If it had not been for that, we would have shown a saving of $34,000,000 on the entire bill. However, as far as I am concerned I do not intend to save at the expense of children and babies and such things as hospitals. The committee has not claimed that we were making a $50,000,000 saving in this hospital program. Instead, we decided to give to that program the entire $150,000,000 which will be available through contractual obligations for various States of the Nation, as the gentleman from Wisconsin has told you, as these States put up their $2 for each dollar that the Federal Government will match.

This has been a very difficult bill. It is a bill which deals with human elements. I am going to close today by telling you this: As a farmer I have fought for years for the AAA payments for agriculture. It is my intention when the Department of Agriculture bill comes before the House to urge the Congress to do away with those payments of $185,000,000 to agriculture; payments to my own group of people, if you please; but I will not get up here today and urge you to cut the control work of tuberculosis, venereal disease, cancer, and other destructive elements. The farmer can contribute his share of triple A payments as his contribution toward national financial security. The Government in turn must eliminate all unnecessary people in its employ, useless bureaus, and agencies. That which is worth while and necessary to the future of America will stay—that which is not absolutely essential, must go. Thank you.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, I move the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOPE, Chairman of the Committee on the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 2700, directed him to report that it had come to no resolution thereon.

HOUR OF MEETING TOMORROW

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the special order granted the gentleman from California [Mr. PHILLIPS] today be vacated and that it may be transferred to Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

SENATE

TUESDAY, MARCH 25, 1947

(Legislative day of Monday, March 24, 1947)

The Senate met, in executive session, at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Peter Marshall, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in Heaven, as we pray for Thy guidance and help, we know that Thou dost not intend prayer to be a substitute for work. We know that we are expected to do our part, for Thou hast made us, not puppets, but persons with minds to think and wills to resolve. Make us willing to think, and think hard, clearly, and honestly, guided by Thy voice within us, and in accordance with the light Thou hast given us. May we never fail to do the very best we can. We pray in the knowledge that it all depends on Thee. Help us then to work as if it all depended on us, that together we may do that which is well pleasing in Thy sight. For Jesus' sake. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. WHITE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the legislative proceedings of Monday, March 24, 1947, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 118) to strengthen the common defense by maintaining an adequate domestic rubber-producing industry.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—APPROVAL OF BILLS

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries, and he announced that on March 21, 1947, the President had approved and signed the following acts:

S. 220. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to convey to American Telephone & Telegraph Co. an easement for communication purposes in certain lands situated in Virginia and Maryland; and

S. 221. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to grant and convey to the Virginia Electric & Power Co. a perpetual easement in two strips of land comprising portions of the Norfolk Navy Yard, Portsmouth, Va., and for other purposes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Under the agreement of last evening, I was to have the floor this morning at the convening of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I understood the Chair to recognize the Senator from Maine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In order that he might request the approval of the Journal. The Senator from Iowa is recognized and has the floor.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, a further parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Is the Senate now in executive session or in legislative session?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is in executive session.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, it was my understanding that the Lilienthal nomination was to be made the unfinished business of the Senate in executive session, and that the Senate would proceed as in legislative session to consider other measures which might be emergent in character. I had hoped that at this time we might resume legislative session in order that the Senator from Michigan might call up the joint resolution providing for participation by the United States in the International Refugee Organization.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, just to make it clear, let me say that, so far as I am concerned, I am happy to have that measure discussed, and have so informed the Senator from Maine. I merely want to clarify the parliamentary situation so there will be no misunderstanding about it.

Mr. WHITE. I do not think there is any misunderstanding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the opinion of the Chair that if the Senate now goes into legislative session and returns to executive session, the Senator from Iowa at that time will be entitled to resume the floor.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. WHITE. I therefore move, Mr. President, that the Senate now resume the consideration of legislative business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate resumed the consideration of legislative business.

PARTICIPATION IN INTERNATIONAL REFUGEE ORGANIZATION

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 77.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAIN in the chair). The joint resolution will be read by title for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 77) providing for membership and participation by the United States in the International Refugee Organization and authorizing an appropriation therefor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which had been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with amendments.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, my colleague the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. MCGRATH] asked me to read into the RECORD the following statement:

I desire to withdraw my name as a sponsor of the amendment to Senate Joint Resolution 77 intended to be proposed by Mr. REVERCOMB for himself, Mr. MCCARRAN, and Mr. MCGRATH.

This action is taken because it has been suggested to me, and I concur in the suggestion, that the language of the amendment might be construed to nullify the existing power of the Chief Executive to administer the present immigration laws.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the first committee amendment.

The first amendment reported by the committee was, on page 1, line 9, after the word "Nations", to insert a colon and the following proviso: "Provided, That this authorization shall not be construed as delegating to the President or any officer, representative, or agency of the United States authority to conclude any agreement with the Organization; (a) authorizing any temporary, emergency, or other immigration or admission to the United States or its Territories or possessions of any refugees or displaced persons referred to in the Constitution of the International Refugee Organization; or (b) abrogating, superseding, suspending, or modifying any law of the United States; or (c) concerning any other matter, in contravention of existing law; or (d) concerning any other matter requiring action by the Congress, or either branch thereof, under the Constitution of the United States."

Mr. VANDENBERG obtained the floor.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. REVERCOMB. I should like at this time, which I think is the proper time, to call up an amendment to be considered prior to the amendment which has just been stated.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think, if the Senator will permit me to say so, that his amendment should be offered as a substitute for the committee amendment.

Mr. REVERCOMB. I am very glad to accept that suggestion, and, Mr. President, at this time I call up for consideration as a substitute for the committee amendment, the amendment which has been offered on behalf of myself and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN]. I ask that the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the committee amendment will be stated

The CHIEF CLERK. In lieu of the committee amendment beginning on page 1, line 9, after the word "nations", and extending to line 12 on page 2, inclusive, it is proposed to insert the following: "Provided, however, That this authority is granted and the approval of the Congress of the acceptance of membership of the United States in the International Refugee Organization is given upon condition and with the reservation that no agreement shall be concluded on behalf of the United States and no action shall be taken by any officer, agency, or any other person (1) whereby any person shall be admitted to or settled or resettled in the United States or any of its Territories or possessions without prior approval thereof by the Congress, and this joint resolution shall not be construed as such prior approval, or (2) which will have the effect of abrogating, suspending, modifying, adding to, or superseding any of the immigration laws or any other laws of the United States."

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I wish to make a brief general statement regarding the pending joint resolution.

I think Senators are familiar with the postwar responsibilities which we confront in the conquered countries of central Europe. Included in those responsibilities is the responsibility for displaced persons, so-called. At the present time we are responsible for 588,000 refugees and persecuted persons, in Germany and Austria. They are living under the American flag. Our administration is responsible for what happens to them.

Up to the present time, and at the moment, this responsibility is divided into three parts. It is being administered in part by the Army, in part by what is left of expiring UNRRA, and in part by the Intergovernmental Committee on Refugees.

As the Senate knows, UNRRA is about to expire. As the Senate knows, the Army has made no estimate to cover a continuation of its share of the responsibility in the next fiscal year. Therefore we confront the necessity of providing a new authority to handle our responsibilities in respect to what we will call generally displaced persons.

I repeat, there are at present 588,000 of them. I might add that while the total number of displaced persons originally amounted to seven or eight million, for whom we ourselves and other Allies were responsible, it is down to approximately 1,000,000, of which number, I repeat, we are responsible for 588,000.

Mr. President, the administration of this responsibility has cost the United States Treasury $130,000,000 in the fiscal year 1947. That is the expenditure which has been required to administer this responsibility. The question is—and it is the question pending in the Senate today—What will happen on July 1, when new auspices must be developed to handle this responsibility?

In order to handle it the United Nations has created an instrumentality known as the International Refugee Organization, to which all members of the United Nations are eligible, but in which not more, at a maximum, than from 15 to 20 are expected to participate, because the interest in the problem is confined within limits growing out of its nature.

The International Refugee Organization will take over the responsibilities of the Army of the United States, heretofore and presently exercised; the responsibility of UNRRA, presently expiring; and the responsibilities of the Intergovernmental Committee on Refugees. It will present a united, organized control of the displaced-persons problem in Germany, Austria, and Italy.

What are the advantages of thus establishing what we will call, for brevity, "IRO," meaning the International Refugee Organization? What are the advantages? If we are to speak first, Mr. President, in terms of dollars and cents, the advantages are these: I repeat, on this problem we spent $130,000,000 in fiscal year 1947. Under IRO, our share of the expenditure for the same responsibility will be a maximum of $75,000,000. Therefore, at the outset, we confront a very substantial economy over the previous year, amounting to the difference between $75,000,000 and $130,000,000, or $55,000,000.

If we were to undertake on our own responsibility to operate the displaced-persons administration in Germany and Austria through the Army alone, which would be our only recourse if IRO were not established, it is estimated by the War Department that the expenditure for the next fiscal year would be $95,000,000 or $100,000,000. In other words, we confront an economy of at least $55,000,000 compared with the previous fiscal year; we confront an economy estimated at $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 under IRO, as compared with the burden we would bear if we were simply to turn this responsibility over to the Army on July 1, and that is our only alternative if IRO is not established.

Mr. President, there is another great advantage in IRO. The ultimate answer to the displaced-persons problem obviously is resettlement of displaced persons. The resettlement problem has been an exceedingly difficult one, but member nations in IRO include not only those which are responsible for the administration of displaced-persons camps; they also include a number of smaller nations which are interested in receiving displaced persons into their populations. It is calculated that there will be far greater impetus in respect to resettlement through the concentration of this responsibility in one place, where those who are responsible for the operation of displaced-persons facilities are joined together with those who are interested in resettlement. Therefore, there are the two contemplated advantages as a result of the enactment of the pending joint resolution; on the one hand, a very substantial cash saving to the Treasury of the United States in respect to responsibilities which we cannot shirk, cannot evade, cannot ignore, and, on the other hand, the substantial advantage of a new impetus in respect to resettlement, which is the ultimate answer to the whole situation.

Mr. President, I think I have outlined in a general way the scope of IRO and the prospectus which is presented in the proposed legislation. The great fear which has been expressed among Senators in respect to it has been that somewhere, somehow, in some way, this particular IRO legislation in some fashion invades our immigration laws and commits us to an acceptance of displaced persons, regardless of existing statutes in the United States. There has been no purpose at any time, in anybody's mind, that the pending resolution, Senate Joint Resolution 77, should invade the immigration laws to the extent of a single comma. From start to finish it has been understood that it has nothing to do with immigration laws, is not intended to invade them, directly or indirectly, and is not contemplated as any sort of commitment, direct or indirect, in respect to our acceptance of displaced persons beyond existing immigration quotas.

In other words, the two subjects are totally unrelated in so far as the purposes of the sponsors of the legislation are concerned. Whether or not the United States is to participate in the acceptance of displaced persons beyond existing quota laws is entirely a matter for separate and distinct legislation, which must be handled and met and answered upon its own independent merits.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. But, if we should pass the joint resolution, would it not indirectly commit us to participate in finding a place for these displaced persons? I think 588,000 is a large number. If we were to contribute places for them within our own borders as we contribute money with which to care for them, it would mean a very large number in addition to the number permitted entry by our immigration laws. But, as I understand the Senator, that is not the purpose of the joint resolution, either directly or indirectly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator is correct, and I cannot state it too categorically or too specifically or with too great finality. There is nothing in the proposal—and it was repeatedly so stated in the hearings by representatives of the State Department—which in any aspect makes any commitment of any nature whatsoever in respect to our receipt of displaced persons.

But in order to make that unequivocally clear, the committee undertook to write an amendment on the subject; and it was at that point that I ran into lawyer trouble. The committee said to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, that if he would be good enough to put in black and white an amendment which would close the door to any such possible immigration latitudes as are suggested by the question of the able Senator from Tennessee, the committee would be glad to adopt it; because it is perfectly clear that that is what is intended. So the able Senator from Wisconsin, in collaboration with some of his distinguished colleagues, including my able friend from West Virginia [Mr. REVERCOMB], and my distinguished colleague the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON] submitted a text which they thought slammed the door and locked it and threw the key away.

We considered that text in the committee, and the distinguished Senator from West Virginia thought he found an attic window open. So we said, "All right, if there are any windows open, let us shut them." Therefore, it was concluded, with the assent of my able friend, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, that we would adopt the Hickenlooper text on the theory that we were going a little further by way of protective device than had been suggested to us through the Judiciary Committee.

The chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee thought everything was placid and settled and that all controversy had been eliminated, when he discovered to his consternation that the able Senator from West Virginia and one or two of his associates decided that the Senator from Iowa had left an attic window open. It is my understanding that finally the amendment submitted by the Senator from Iowa is satisfactory to all those who are undertaking to make it indubitably plain that this joint resolution has nothing whatsoever to do with our immigration. So far as I am concerned, inasmuch as I understand that the amendment applies to the text of the pending joint resolution and its restrictions are related to the business in hand, I have said that I am perfectly willing to substitute the amendment submitted by the Senator from West Virginia. In any event, I should like to make it as plain as I have failed to make it for the last 4 weeks of "lawyer trouble"—I should like to make it as plain as possible that there is nothing intended in this joint resolution to affect one single comma in our own immigration laws.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am glad to yield.

Mr. ELLENDER. I should like to know the extent to which the organization will be compelled to pay for the food, the clothing, the housing, and the transportation of displaced persons.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The organization will take over all responsibilities in all those aspects which have heretofore been borne either by the Army or by UNRRA.

Mr. ELLENDER. Who will pay for those services?

Mr. VANDENBERG. It will be paid from the assessment upon the International Refugee Organization.

Mr. ELLENDER. Is it the Senator's view that $75,000,000 will be all that this Government will be called upon to furnish the Organization for the fiscal year beginning June 30, 1947?

Mr. VANDENBERG. It is the estimate of the Department that that is—I have forgotten the word used, but it is a word which indicates that the limit is a very close one, and contemplates a very close diet, and is of itself a minimum. But it is accepted by the Department as a maximum, and in order to make perfectly sure that the answer to the Senator's question is "yes," we wrote an amendment into the pending joint resolution which says that the authorization is limited to $75,000,000 for the present year.

Mr. ELLENDER. That is that the appropriation shall not exceed that amount?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. ELLENDER. How was the figure $75,000,000 determined as our share in this venture?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I shall be very glad to tell the Senator. It involves a brief narrative, if the Senator will bear with me.

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes; I will be glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The question involves the whole subject of what share of expense the Government of the United States should carry in the United Nations in relation to the other memberships. There are two types of expenditures in the United Nations. One type is administrative and the other is operational. The administrative formula is standard because it applies to everything alike. The operational formula varies in respect to the operation for obvious reasons. The share of the United States for 1 year's administrative expense of the United Nations is 39 percent-plus.

Mr. ELLENDER. Of the entire amount necessary to operate the administrative functions of the Organization?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Of all administrative budgets. I will say to the Senator that that figure was arrived at as follows—and I might as well make this explanation now, because it will apply to a number of other problems from the United Nations which will be on the floor of the Senate during the course of the present session of Congress.

At the first meeting of the General Assembly in London last winter a provisional allocation of funds was made because obviously at that time there was no basis for a permanent allocation. But a special committee was appointed to make a study of relative capacities to pay among the various member nations.

When we reached New York for the second meeting of the General Assembly we discovered to our consternation that this special committee, including in its membership the Director of the Bureau of the Budget of the United States, had subscribed to the fact that the United States has 50 percent of the income-producing capacity of the entire earth at the present time. It was the view of many of us that in the first place those figures were too nebulous to be reliable; in the second place, that it was a serious threat to the sovereign equality of membership in an organization of this sort if any one member nation paid as much as half of its administrative expenses. So it fell to my rather embarrassed lot to try to drive down the administrative percentage from 50 percent to what we thought was an appropriate figure, namely 33⅓ percent. But some of our friends in the General Assembly gloried in the opportunity they confronted to insist that we pay 50 percent, and my friend Mr.—well, my friends, the representative of the Soviet Union, were particularly engrossed with the idea that we ought to pay 50 percent.

I must confess to the Senator that I was almost down and out in the argument when it occurred to me to say to our Soviet friends one day, "Now listen: We like these compliments to our economic system, but we do not like expensive flattery, and I would suggest to you that if 5 percent of the people of this earth have got 50 percent of its income capacity we have got an economic system that had better be made mandatory on all members of the United Nations so that they can catch up with us."

That argument held the line of about 10 days, when my Soviet friend came back with what I thought was a pretty good answer. However, it took him 10 days to think of it. He said, "No; the explanation made by the delegate from the United States is incorrect. The 50-percent figure does not reflect the superiorities of the American economic system. It reflects the fact that not one bomb fell on America in World War I, and not one bomb fell on America in World War II." That was a pretty good answer. At any rate, the net result was a compromise for 1 year only, that our share of administrative expenditures in the various United Nations instrumentalities should be 39 percent plus.

We come now to the operational budget. Obviously the share of the United States in an operational budget bears somewhat upon the share of the United States in the particular problem involved in the operational budget. In other words, we would have a different percentage in a specialized agency which had general interest around the world, as compared with a specialized agency which represented a particular and peculiar and emphatic American responsibility, as in the instance of displaced persons. The Senator will remember that we are responsible for 588,000 displaced persons out of 1,037,000.

Mr. ELLENDER. Does the Senator mean displaced persons who have come to the American zone of German occupation?

Mr. VANDENBERG. They are in American displaced-persons camps or under our displaced-persons administration in the American zones in Germany and Austria. That means that our share of the DP problem in terms of displaced persons is something like 58 percent, but our operational figure was fixed as 45 percent of the total of 100 percent if all the nations joined the organization.

Mr. ELLENDER. That was the next subject I was about to discuss with the Senator. What assurance have we——

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let me conclude my explanation. It was clearly recognized that all the members of the United Nations would not be interested in joining. For example, neither the Soviet Union nor any of its associated powers, let us say, have any interest in this problem because they handle problems of this nature in a totally different fashion. So if 15 nations join—I believe 12 have joined—we shall still pay 45 percent of 100 percent, which means that we shall pay about 55 percent of what is actually contemplated.

Mr. ELLENDER. Of the whole amount necessary to——

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. ELLENDER. Does the Senator know where the other displaced persons are, by regions? He stated that the United States was responsible for more than half a million, now located within that part of Germany and Austria under our control.

Does the Senator know where the others are located and how they will be taken care of?

Mr. VANDENBERG. If the Senator has the hearings before him, he will find four charts which give all the detailed information.

Mr. ELLENDER. I am sorry. I was very busy before another committee. I just returned to the Chamber, and I have not had the time to study the report. I thought probably it might be a good thing to have that information in the RECORD.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I can tell the Senator roughly. Of 1,037,000 displaced persons and refugees, we are responsible for 588,000. The United Kingdom is responsible for 349,000. France is responsible for 61,000. The share which is here allocated to the United Kingdom does not include 200,000 Poles who were in General Anders' army, all of whom have been taken under the exclusive responsibility of the United Kingdom, at their own expense. That is the general breakdown.

Mr. ELLENDER. From the chart it appears that the Russians have some, also.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Will the Senator repeat that statement?

Mr. ELLENDER. Are there any displaced persons in the Russian zone?

Mr. VANDENBERG. No; I think there are none.

Mr. ELLENDER. Have they all taken refuge in, or been shoved into, the American zone?

Mr. VANDENBERG. No.

Mr. ELLENDER. I was in Europe last summer, and I was informed by high officials of the army that thousands moved into our zone of occupation. Some were forced in and others came over the border without authority. I was told that the Russians placed into the American zone as many displaced persons as they possibly could.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let me answer the Senator before he goes further. Let us consider one question at a time. I think there are no displaced persons in the Russian zone.

Mr. ELLENDER. Does the Senator know why that is?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes. I am about to tell the Senator.

Mr. ELLENDER. I should like to know.

Mr. VANDENBERG. There is no doubt that many displaced persons and refugees filtered over into the American and British zones. But the fundamental difference, which the Senator will immediately recognize, is that in the American zone we flatly refuse to permit any involuntary repatriation. In the Russian zone all repatriation is involuntary—or else voluntary; one or the other. So it is fundamentally a great American principle that displaced persons, refugees, and persecutees who are the victims of the war shall not be sent back to places where they are afraid of their lives if they go. We stand immutably against involuntary repatriation, and that is why we have camps. That is why the Russians do not.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I shall be glad to yield as soon as I have completed my replies to the questions of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. ELLENDER. I learned a good deal while I was over there last summer. I was informed that thousands of displaced persons came to our zone not only because they expected better treatment than was accorded persons in other zones, but in the hope that we in America would open our hearts and cause the Congress to enact laws lowering the bars of immigration so that all of those in our zone would find a haven in America. I have made the statement on many occasions since my return from abroad that so far as I was concerned, I would not lend my support to change our immigration laws in any respect in order to permit them to come to this country. On the contrary, I am for stopping all immigration for a period of 5 years so that we can put our own house in order.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let me comment at that point, so that we may not get off the track. If there is anyone over there who has any notion that through legislation such as the pending measure there is to be a free entry into the United States, it is because he has not heard about the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. REVERCOMB], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER], and other Senators who are making this measure so plain that no one can misunderstand it.

Mr. ELLENDER. I am delighted and I desire to now associate myself with those distinguished Senators.

I should like to ask the Senator one further question. Will the organization have jurisdiction over all displaced persons, irrespective of their location? Will the same group of administrators and officials handle those in the American zone and the British zone as well as other zones?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. ELLENDER. Are there any plans by which displaced persons will be given a home? Is there anything in sight, or has any plan been developed? Exactly how will the problem of relocation be dealt with?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is the second phase of the matter to which I referred in my opening statement. The answer to this problem does not lie in appropriations for subsistence; the answer lies in successful resettlement.

The second fundamental function of the IRO is to proceed wherever possible to arrange for resettlement, and with the preliminary possibilities of that nature as described to the committee by General Hilldring, he hoped that arrangements for quite substantial numbers could be perfected by the organization within the next year in some South American countries and in some of the low countries of Europe.

Mr. ELLENDER. Has the Senator any idea how long it will require to place these displaced persons?

Mr. VANDENBERG. None whatever. All I know is that we have them on our hands and that at least for the next 12 months we have to do something about it, and in the unanimous opinion of the Committee on Foreign Relations this is the best way to handle it.

Mr. ELLENDER. Does the Senator know whether any of the countries of the world have requested that some of these displaced persons be made available to them?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes; I think they have.

Mr. ELLENDER. Does the Senator know to what extent?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I cannot answer the question with figures.

May I supplement my answer to the Senator from Louisiana? I have one specific exhibit. A joint declaration was made on February 18, 1947, by the Venezuelan Ambassador in London and the head office of the Intergovernmental Committee on Refugees that the Venezuelan Government would receive during 1947 a number of refugee immigrants which it is hoped will reach a total of 5,000 families, or approximately 15,000 persons.

Mr. ELLENDER. I noticed from press reports the other day that the French had suggested they could take some German citizens, and I assume the British will also take some.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I cannot answer in detail. All I can say is that General Hilldring notified us that there are at long last some substantial prospects of resettlement.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. TOBEY. I ask the Senator from Michigan if he does not agree with me—and I want to commend his attitude and that of others of the delegation—that the position which America takes on this subject is one further asset in building up our great American traditions.

Mr. VANDENBERG. If we took any other attitude we would cut our American traditions from ear to ear.

Mr. TOBEY. That is correct. Regarding the apprehensions and fears which are expressed by some Senators and which brought about the progressive series of amendments and restored confidence in the attitude of the Senator from Michigan, have those apprehensions and fears now been allayed?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think they should have been.

Mr. TOBEY. The Senator is always magnificent when he is on his feet, but it seems to me that it is regrettable that he had to exert so much mental and physical effort and take so much time of the Senate to carry through his convictions about the virtues and values involved in this matter. I am willing to take the word of the Senator from Michigan when he says "It does not"—period.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the Senator.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McMAHON. It occurs to me that the Senator from Michigan has very eloquently stated the good work which is projected by some of the other nations of the earth in planning to assimilate some of these displaced persons. From what I have heard elsewhere and from the statement which the Senator has made, including some of the questioning, it seems to be a case of our wanting resettlement but not wanting to have any part in it.

I was particularly impressed with the Senator's statement regarding American traditions which we are so gloriously upholding in not sending displaced persons to countries where they would be oppressed. I thoroughly, wholeheartedly, and totally approve of that. We also have a tradition—or I thought we had—of offering some kind of a refuge for oppressed, persecuted, and downtrodden peoples. The Statue of Liberty which stands at the entrance of New York harbor has been greeted by many future citizens who have made their contributions to what America is today. I hope that on further reflection Congress may see fit at some time in the near future to set an example to the other nations of the earth and let it be a case of "do as we do" and not "do as we say."

Mr. VANDENBERG. I can understand the Senator's feeling. I simply say to him that for the purpose of this proposed legislation it is very important to keep the two subjects separated, because there is a sharp divergence of opinion respecting any additional latitude in our immigration laws. That subject will have to be threshed out on its own merits, in due season.

I do not see how there can be any difference of opinion regarding the wisdom of passing Senate Joint Resolution 77 and putting the United States into IRO, for unless we join it, we are left, first, with veritable chaos with respect to displaced persons in the German and Austrian zones under the jurisdiction of the United States; second, if we do not do this we confront an infinitely heavier expenditure for responsibilities which we cannot escape and cannot ignore; and third, because the IRO does offer an organized promise of resettlement.

I should like to keep the two subjects totally unrelated, because it is so desperately important that this particular thing should be done at once, because there are only 90 days left in which to organize our administration, and it is a terrific responsibility.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. PEPPER. I desire to have the privilege of associating myself wholeheartedly with the sentiment expressed by the able Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McMAHON].

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one more question?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. ELLENDER. After we become a member of this organization, will we be forced to continue our membership and to contribute to it until such time as all the displaced persons in Europe are relocated?

Mr. VANDENBERG. No; we can file notice at any time, after 1 year, and retire from the organization 12 months later. So that in any event it would not have to be more than 2 years.

Mr. ELLENDER. It would not have to be more than 2 years if we wished to be relieved?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. ELLENDER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. In that connection, may I call the Senator's attention to the fact that General Hilldring testified, and I believe it was not disputed, that this problem ought to be solved in from 3 to 5 years. He declined to say that it could be solved within 2 or 3 years, but that it would be reduced year by year. The estimated cost was given as from seventy-one to seventy-three million dollars a year. Therefore a second amendment, which has not been read, was inserted in the joint resolution calling for an annual authorization as well as an annual appropriation, and the first authorization provides for not exceeding $75,000,000.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am very glad the Senator has made that statement. I overlooked it. Instead of being presented as originally written, in the form of a continuing authorization, it contains an authorization for only 1 year, and we are to review the whole subject 12 months hence. As the able Senator from Georgia indicates, our best expert on the subject, General Hilldring, prophesies that the problem itself can be liquidated within from 3 to 5 years.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I shall not consume much time. I feel that it is really unnecessary to add anything to the very able and illuminating explanation given by the Senator from Michigan. The Committee on Foreign Relations considered this matter in great detail. We had before us General Hilldring, who has given a year or two of his time in Europe to the handling of this problem.

We are confronted with a situation, not a theory. The Army has on its hands in Germany these displaced persons and refugees. We are feeding them; we are housing them; we are clothing them. As has been suggested here, on account of our generous treatment of them, many more have come over the lines into the American zone from other zones. It has been our policy to put them on the rolls and to take care of them. Of course, this condition cannot continue indefinitely. We do not want to continue it indefinitely. The obligations we have assumed have placed this duty on the Army. It is felt that the Army should divest itself of this responsibility, and should devote itself to purely military and occupational tasks.

So this joint resolution has been devised, and under it we hope the expenditures will be considerably less than they are now under Army administration.

Of course, it is desirable to bring about the resettlement of these displaced persons when and if opportunity presents. In the hearings it developed that a number of countries have expressed an interest in obtaining certain numbers of immigrants from these sources. The organization has not yet been formed and it has not been able to bring about negotiations going into the details of the conditions under which such immigration should take place.

Let me say that we are faced with two alternatives: Either participating in the International Refugee Organization or continuing on our own responsibility, with perhaps increasing operations, increasing expenditures, and increasing difficulties. Those are the alternatives which are presented to us.

So far as the immigration laws of the United States are concerned, provision to cover that aspect of the case is meticulously made by the joint resolution. The three or four lawyers mentioned by the Senator from Michigan, with their skill and legal acumen, have prepared amendments to this measure which will make it absolutely clear and unequivocal, beyond any question of doubt, that this measure in no wise authorizes anyone to modify, suspend, circumvent, or evade any laws of the United States relating to immigration, or, for that matter, any other law of the United States.

So, Mr. President, it seems to me that as we are situated, and in view of the alternatives which are presented to us, we should enact this joint resolution with the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. REVERCOMB], which has been accepted by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, in the hearings before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee a letter was introduced, written by Gen. George C. Marshall, Secretary of State, to the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] setting forth his views in behalf of Senate Joint Resolution 77, a measure to authorize United States membership in the International Refugee Organization.

In his letter, the Secretary of State makes the following statement:

> At the climax of the war in Europe, on April 20, 1945, to be exact, I transmitted to the leaders of the Congress an urgent message from the supreme commander of the Allied Expeditionary Force. In that message General Eisenhower referred to the unspeakable conditions found in the concentration camps then being liberated by our advancing armies. He invited the congressional leaders to make a flying trip to Germany to see for themselves "the full evidence of the cruelty practiced by the Nazis in such places as normal procedure."
> With a deep sense of responsibility, a bipartisan committee of 12 Senators and Representatives dropped their current business and departed by air for Germany. They saw for themselves, and through their eyes, the whole country saw, too. The report of this joint committee, signed by all 12 members, ranks in my opinion as an historic document. It described vividly the tragic plight of those who were victimized by the Nazis. It recorded firm determination to do everything possible to right the appalling wrongs perpetrated by the enemy. It was a moral mandate, to soldier and civilian alike, to exert every effort to help these unfortunate people.
> Almost 2 years have elapsed since that joint congressional report. More than 3,500,000 of our soldiers have been returned from the European battleground. Seven million displaced persons have been assisted to return to their homes from areas under the control of the western Allied armies. Many of the German war criminals responsible for the suffering and dislocation of these people have been tried and punished. However, some of the victims of Nazi concentration camps are still in displaced persons centers in our occupied areas. We also have many others who, although not actually confined in concentration camps, had been uprooted from their homes by the Nazis and brought to Germany for forced labor. They are still there. Why? Because we will not force them back against their will to the countries from which they were uprooted; and because they have not yet been resettled elsewhere. We are now faced with this pressing question: What is to happen to these people?

Mr. President, it was my privilege to be one of the congressional delegation that inspected the concentration camps at the invitation of General Marshall and the commander in chief of our military forces, and I saw first-hand hundreds of those who were victimized by the Nazis. I joined unanimously with the other 11 members of that delegation in the recommendations which were submitted to the Congress and to the Commander in Chief of our Military Forces. Many of those recommendations have been carried out.

It was my privilege, again, last November and a part of December to visit Germany and Austria; and, once again, I inspected several of the concentration camps called "displaced persons camps" in those two countries. I was dumbfounded to learn that the number in our German zone had increased to 456,000 at that time, and in the Austrian zone to more than 230,000, and that daily we were receiving thousands of displaced persons who were coming into the American zone under the definition of refugees and persecutees—terms which have become so broadened that we have taken into our zone thousands of persons, who are classed as persecutees, who have either been expelled or who have come to the American zone for help and aid because of the fear for their lives if they remain in the countries from which they came. I think the week I was there General Clark told me that more than 30,000 of them came that week into our zones in Germany and Austria.

Mr. President, if political persecutees are to continue to find refuge in the American Zones of Germany and Austria, that means that instead of thousands, there may be millions before this problem is solved. This is only the beginning; and so it is most important that the provisions and terms of the constitution under which the International Relief Organization is to operate shall be defined, and certainly we should know who are to define them.

In the light of the observations I have made, I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Michigan how these definitions can possibly anticipate the additional categories of refugees or persecutees who will emerge when the peace treaties are finally negotiated. I should like to make an observation before the Senator answers the question.

To be specific, I quote from a memorandum from A. A. Berle, Jr., released on February 10, on the Italian peace treaty, as follows:

> Even in peace treaties, I suppose, decent attention ought to be paid to the amount of misery they create. One effect of this treaty—

He was referring to the Italian treaty—> will be the immediate migration of a great number of Italian citizens from territory to be turned over to Yugoslavia. They will, in fact, become homeless refugees in Italy.

That will be their plight. I read further from Mr. Berle:

> This is not what the treaty says. It is the result of a condition of affairs by which many thousands of Italians will not risk remaining in Yugoslav territory, where there exists a period of revolutionary terror, and where political revenge is being carried out with extreme ruthlessness. The number of added displaced persons can only be estimated. * * * And there is thus added another item to the black page of individual misery which so-called peacemaking in Europe has already caused.

That is a statement by Mr. Berle in reference to the question I have asked the distinguished Senator from Michigan, namely, what will happen to the refugees from the various countries when we sign the five peace treaties?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. First, in responding to the able Senator, I should say that I know he has not overlooked the fact that the letter from General Marshall, from which he read, unequivocally requests the passage of the pending joint resolution.

Mr. WHERRY. Oh, yes. I am not opposing the joint resolution. I am going to suggest some amendments to it, not, perhaps, with the idea that they will be adopted by the Senate, but to ask the distinguished Senator if he will not take them with him to conference in the event the House should amend the joint resolution. The amendments embody suggestions which I think would be helpful in considering the definitions.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Any suggestions from the Senator are always helpful, and will always be welcome.

Mr. WHERRY. I should not want the Senator to answer the question with any feeling that I am going to oppose the resolution. I am merely here as one Member of the Senate trying to get what information I can, and to have the benefit of the Senator's good judgment as to definitions in regard to some of the aspects of the proposal.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Even when the Senator says, "Good morning," he says it so vehemently that I am always a little scared. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, the answer to the Senator's question is that it must be found in the definitions in the Charter. As I understand, refugees are persons who have fled from their former homes in the face of persecution and of advancing armies. Displaced persons are people who have been taken from their former homes by force and introduced into other countries as slave laborers. However, the definition is of no very great importance.

I do not know whether the ultimate result of the peace treaties will be the creation of such a type of displaced-persons problem as that which we now confront, because it is my understanding that migration is already under way in those areas in a rather orderly fashion, and without any responsibility upon the occupying powers.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. REVERCOMB. On the very point which the able Senator from Michigan has discussed, I wish to call attention to the language of the constitution to which we are asked to subscribe. I call attention to page 14, the language "Persons who will not be the concern of the Organization." This is a copy of the constitution itself.

Mr. VANDENBERG. What page?

Mr. REVERCOMB. I am reading from a copy of the constitution as furnished by the Department of State. Among the persons who will not be considered as refugees are those enumerated. I read:

> 6. Persons who, since the end of hostilities in the Second World War * * * have become leaders of movements hostile to the Government of their country of origin, being a member of the United Nations or sponsors of movements encouraging refugees not to return to their country of origin.

I wish to say to the able Senator who is discussing this matter that I understand there are today about 30,000 nationals of Yugoslavia in Italy—and Yugoslavia is a member of the United Nations—who cannot return home because they were members of a hostile army. They cannot return home because they would be killed by the present regime in the country. Mihailovich, himself, was executed. This refers to persons some of whom served in the American forces, under the American flag. Under this language does the Senator think it is fair not to class them as refugees and as such entitled to receive the help of this country?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Will the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. In the first place, I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the language which he has read says: "Persons who, since the end of hostilities in the Second World War," and so forth. It is not my understanding that the forces of General Mihailovich, for example, were in rebellion following the termination of the war, and after the organization of the United Nations. I should say that any persecutees or refugees who are throw-backs from what happened during the war itself were eligible, but I submit to the Senator that we cannot maintain this particular organization for those who may be presently in revolt against the members of the United Nations which are setting up the organization to handle the situation.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Will the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. REVERCOMB. I call the attention of the able Senator from Michigan to the fact that it does not say in revolt against the United Nations. I read this language:

> Persons who, since the end of hostilities in the Second World War * * * have become sponsors of movements encouraging refugees not to return to their country of origin.

Of course, those people cannot return to the country of their origin. If the Yugoslavs referred to should go back to their former homes, they would be killed, and is not that equally true of some 200,000 Poles who fought alongside the British, who fought first against Russia and then fought against Germany, and cannot go back because they would be put into slavery by Russia, or executed?

I call the attention of the able Senator to the language in the agreement itself. If they "sponsor movements which encourage refugees not to return to their country of origin," they cannot be helped. That seems a severe provision. I am merely trying to point out some things in the document to which we are subscribing which I wish could be eliminated.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I ask the Senator again to distinguish between those of the type he defines, whose status was established before the termination of the war, and before the establishment of these new national governments—distinguish between them and those who subsequently may revolt against an established government which is a member of the United Nations.

If the Senator will permit me, if there is one thing more than another of which the United States has a right to be proud, in my opinion, it is that as to all the displaced persons, persecutees, and refugees to whom the Senator refers, whose status was created during World War II, the Government of the United States has stood like a concrete wall against their involuntary repatriation at any time. We had a bitter show-down on the floor of the General Assembly on the subject. We have insisted they should not be involuntarily repatriated, and they are all eligible to our assistance.

I call the Senator's attention to the language on page 12 of the printed text—I have not the original text here—subdivision 2 of section A, which particularly defines a refugee who is eligible as a person outside of his country of nationality or former habitual residence and who, as a result of events subsequent to the outbreak of the Second World War, is unable or unwilling to avail himself of the protection of the government of his country of nationality or former nationality.

In other words, it seems to me that the answer to the Senator's question is that all persons of the type he indicates are eligible up to the point where they rebel against member nations of the United Nations. So far as I am concerned, I think it is quite obvious that the line must be drawn at that point in an organization which is supported by the United Nations.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Let me say to the able Senator from Michigan that I know full well the attitude taken by the United States toward persons who cannot safely return home, and I hope that our country and our Government will continue to maintain that attitude. It is for that very reason that I am asking why these people who cannot return home are excluded from being considered as refugees.

Let me say to the able Senator, on this line, that what he has read from the record is the general rule; what he last read is the general application. I have that language before me. But if the Senator will turn to another page, he will note that exceptions are made, and definitions are provided of persons who are not to be considered as refugees. After the general rule is prescribed, the able Senator knows the application of an exception which says:

> Those persons who, since the end of hostilities in the Second World War * * * have become sponsors of movements encouraging refugees not to return to their country of origin.

I say it is absolutely against the principle for which this country has stood and to which it has adhered to compel persons to return to their former homes, there to be executed or mistreated; yet we find that this agreement to which we are asked to subscribe today violates that policy and principle as to persons who sponsor those who refuse to return because they are in danger. I have the concrete example of some 30,000 Yugoslavs and some 200,000, I am told, Poles.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that something ought to be done to that part of this agreement. The purpose of the agreement to look after these people is lofty; it is splendid; but when we make an exception of that kind it is not right and does not accord with what we have done heretofore.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I would be glad to yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Everything the Senator has said totally certifies the distinction I drew for him in respect to this problem. We are in complete agreement as to what this language means. I say again that those who are not eligible are "persons who, since the end of hostilities in the Second World War, have participated in any organization having as one of its purposes the overthrow by armed force of the government of their country of origin, being a member of the United Nations."

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, will the Senator continue to read?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Just a moment. In other words, we are not recognizing as persecutees or refugees those who are in rebellion against member nations of the United Nations, and I submit that we would object very strenuously if anybody applied any other sort of rule to us. Now, what is it the Senator wants me to read?

Mr. REVERCOMB. The able Senator is reading section (a), with which I have no dispute, and which I have not mentioned. I want the Senator to read section (b). Read it to us.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am reading from part II.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Part II, section (b).

Mr. VANDENBERG. Very well; section (b) means exactly the same thing.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Please read it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. It reads:

> Have become leaders of movements hostile to the government of their country of origin being a member of the United Nations or sponsors of movements encouraging refugees not to return to their country of origin.

I say again that this applies to those who are acting against member nations of the United Nations. I do not understand how anybody can expect the United Nations to sponsor a movement which offers a sanctuary to those who try to overthrow members of the United Nations.

Mr. REVERCOMB. I agree heartily; but that is not the point I have raised—action to overthrow the governments of the members of the United Nations.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is what the provision says.

Mr. REVERCOMB. But the Senator read very clearly this language "or"—that is in the disjunctive—"sponsors of movements encouraging refugees not to return to their country of origin."

That can mean only one thing, that anyone or any group that sponsors refugees and encourages them not to return to their homes because of what might happen to them, cannot be treated as refugees and receive help under this organization. I can see no other meaning.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I see that the Senator now is confining his observation to the final phrase.

Mr. REVERCOMB. I have, from the beginning, sir; and it is the only phrase I have read.

Mr. VANDENBERG. It reads "or sponsors of movements encouraging refugees not to return to their country of origin."

I submit to the Senator that, so far as the individual rights of persecutees or displaced persons or refugees are concerned, it is covered elsewhere in the charter. This particular language refers to those who are engaged in the organized effort to keep us in the business of supporting displaced persons the rest of their lives. We confront a very serious problem in these camps in respect to organized movements about any repatriation, voluntary or otherwise; and obviously, among five or six hundred thousand people of this type there is plenty of opportunity for exploitation of the largess of which they are the beneficiaries. In my opinion this language is aimed against those who are "sponsors of movements encouraging refugees not to return to their country of origin."

It does not have any effect upon any refugee himself who, under the definition, is entitled to be protected. It applies only to the sponsors of movements to make displaced persons permanent and to make our responsibility in Germany and in Austria go on forever.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is the only explanation I can give, if I repeated it 50 times.

Mr. REVERCOMB. I am not going to ask the able Senator for another explanation, because I hope his explanation is correct. I wish the provision had been written in a way that would sustain his explanation. I hope it is correct, but the language of this agreement as I read it hardly justifies that explanation.

In another part of this very constitution it is provided that persons who will not accept or will not act in good faith under the direction of this organization, of course, cannot be treated as refugees.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I want to thank the distinguished Senator from West Virginia for raising the question he has raised. It is one of the questions I propound later in my remarks. I also want to thank the able Senator from Michigan for his answers.

I think, however, that the fact that two very able Senators disagree on the language of that particular section is further evidence that there is a question as to what the terms are. The terms should certainly be defined in language that we all understand. They should be so defined because, when the matter comes before an international organization, one may well believe interpretations will be made which will suit each and every country individually, if anything can be gained thereby. That has been our experience with similar organizations. Furthermore, beyond the shadow of a doubt this is not merely a temporary organization. It will be of lengthy duration. I cannot draw any other conclusion.

The testimony that the performance of this task will require from 3 to 5 years ought to be the basis for the program upon which we prepare to act when we ratify the constitution. I believe it is unfair to say that this is a temporary organization. I believe the Senator from Michigan himself will agree that this is a task that will be carried on for years if we perform it as it is expected that it shall be performed, and resettle these displaced persons. That will require considerable time. I think it will require much more than 2 years. I think it will require at least 5 years, and I think the proposed appropriation of $75,000,000 is merely the first appropriation. I think next year, the following year, the year following that, and the year thereafter there will be succeeding appropriations which we will be called upon to make to carry on the work of the international organization.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Of course, if the Senator does not propose to make the appropriation for the International Refugee Organization in that aspect, he will have to favor the making of a larger one for the Army to do the same job.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I usually agree with the distinguished Senator from Michigan because I have confidence in his judgment and I follow his leadership in respect to foreign-relations problems, but I cannot agree with that particular statement. I have seen so much of so-called international spending, so much of so-called cooperation, under which the United States of America has actually paid the bill, that I think the time has come, if we are to go into these international organizations, when we should appraise our experience with UNRRA and other organizations. I think it would be more economical for the United States to take upon its own shoulders this responsibility, spend its own money as it feels it should for relief and for refugees, rather than to put it into the pot of an international organization.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. If that is the Senator's belief, then he should be opposing the joint resolution which the Senator from Michigan is advocating.

Mr. WHERRY. In answer to that, I should like to state to the distinguished Senator from Oregon that I have gone along with a considerable amount of legislation in order to expedite matters, but I have a perfect right in connection with the pending measure to make my own wishes and thoughts and desires known. I can vote for the pending joint resolution conscientiously and go along with it with the expectation and hope that the recommendations I am making shall be taken to conference to be considered by the conferees, so that some of the terms of the joint resolution may be defined more clearly. I hope my recommendations may be considered in conference.

Mr. MORSE. I understood the Senator from Michigan to say that, of course, if we do not do it through the international organization we will have to do it through a military appropriation. Does the Senator from Nebraska question that statement?

Mr. WHERRY. No; I do not question it. The Senator from Michigan said it would cost more money to do it through the military organization. I said I questioned that statement.

Mr. MORSE. Does the Senator think we could assume the complete burden through the military organization for less than it would cost through the international organization?

Mr. WHERRY. I think I can convince the Senator that we are practically assuming the complete burden, anyway.

On pages 15 and 16 of the constitution, the allocations for member nations which are entitled to come into this organization are set forth in tables A and B, but is it not a fact, I ask the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, that only 11 have signed the International Refugee Organization?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes; but the constitution of the organization cannot come into effect until 15 have signed, representing 75 percent of the budget.

Mr. WHERRY. I agree with the chairman. But only 11 have signed so far, and only 1 of them has signed unconditionally; that is, only 1 has ratified the constitution without reservation, and that is the United Kingdom.

Mr. VANDENBERG. If the Senator will permit me, I will say that according to all testimony the chief reason for the delay is the fact that we for perfectly sound reasons are unable to take the leadership, and obviously this is our show.

Mr. WHERRY. I do not quarrel with that statement. I think the Senator from Michigan has done everything he could to obtain action. But the point I make is that only 11 signatures are affixed to the constitution, and only 1 nation, the United Kingdom, has ratified the constitution without reservation.

Of the 11 nations which are signatory to the constitution and whose contributions with ours make up 70 percent of the budget, how many are now receiving or have received loans or grants from the United States? I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Michigan if it is not true that with the exception of one of those countries we have made loans and grants to them all in order to keep them going?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I do not have the list before me, but if we have made such loans I assume they were made for sound reasons and sound purposes. Will the Senator from Nebraska name one or two of them? I do not have the list before me.

Mr. WHERRY. The list appears at the bottom of page 17.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I shall read the list. It is as follows:

Canada, Dominican Republic, France, Guatemala, Honduras, Liberia, Netherlands, Norway, Philippine Republic, United Kingdom, United States.

Yes; we have made loans to the Philippine Republic, but the mere fact that we have made loans on a soundly contained basis for other reasons does not reflect, in my opinion, upon the integrity of the attitude of the Philippine Government in agreeing to take its share of this responsibilty.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I realize that the distinguished Senator can take the position that any loan we make is sound. I merely have to point out that we entered into the Bretton Woods agreements, and we made various foreign loans. We made one to France and one to Great Britain. All I have to do is to call to mind the huge sums we have loaned which I doubt very much will be paid back. The history of such loans is that they are not paid back. Eighty percent of them are not repaid. So in reality what it is proposed that we do here is to advance money to these 11 nations to finance this program on the theory that we are getting something in return from them, when in reality the United States is paying the bill and the international organization is framing the policy with respect to what we shall do in our zone, which includes most of the displaced persons.

The constitution which we are called upon today to ratify was signed by Warren R. Austin, subject to congressional approval, December 15, 1946. Since that time world conditions have changed and the policy of the United States has changed notably with respect to the sphere of influence of the Soviet Union, which is evidenced by the President's recent proclamation of his all-out war against communism at home and abroad. According to Dean Acheson's own statement, made in the hearings, the vast majority of these refugees now in our zones are political refugees from the Soviet sphere of influence.

I quote Mr. Acheson's words:

The problem, then, is that of the remaining displaced persons, about 1,000,000 people, of whom some 600,000 are in the United States zone.

Of these people, almost all come from the countries of eastern Europe. Perhaps a third are registered as Poles, a fifth as Balts, a fourth as Jews, and smaller fractions as Yugoslavs and citizens of the Soviet Union, stateless, and of miscellaneous origin.

In view of the change in policy, does the distinguished Senator from Michigan now feel that this problem should be handled by an international board in which Russia has membership and may have a determining voice?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The International Refugee Organization has been set up against the constant, persistent, relentless opposition of the Soviet Union. It does not belong to the organization. It will not sign. None of its component countries will sign, and it will have nothing whatsoever to say about the administration of the organization.

Mr. WHERRY. There is no bar against Russia becoming a member. There is no bar against a country which is a satellite of Russia becoming a member if it sees that it can get something out of the organization and at the same time help frame the policies with respect to the resettlement problem.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. WHERRY. Yes; I am glad to yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. It had not occurred to me that I am not sufficiently suspicious of communism to be adequately diligent against hypotheses of this nature. I can only say to the Senator that if he had faced the bitter opposition, the persistent, the constant opposition of the Soviet Union and its associate powers in connection with this problem, an opposition which is perfectly understandable inasmuch as this organization is committed to the principle that there shall be no involuntary repatriation of refugees and persecutees—if the Senator had faced that opposition day by day by day, he would not indulge in what to me is the rather fantastic notion that for some reason which is entirely beyond my comprehension they are going to offer to join an organization which would require them to surrender the very fundamental principle upon which they deal with displaced persons, namely the principle that displaced persons shall be handled as pawns to suit the state.

Mr. WHERRY. Certainly our experience with UNRRA, which was mentioned a few moments ago as an international agency, ought to be a warning to us before we go into the proposed international organization, if in any way this organization could be used as an instrument by Russia to further her own interests. I appreciate the answer of the distinguished Senator from Michigan; but I think this organization could be used by Russia and her satellite countries to further their own interests.

Let me quote from Mr. Clayton's statement about UNRRA. I opposed UNRRA for the very reason that I think we ought to go into this organization with our eyes open. I doubt very much if any of us have gone into this thing with our eyes open. I did not see the charter until last Thursday night, and I doubt if other Senators have much information about it. That is no reflection upon them. We were told that if we went into UNRRA, other nations would also contribute, and that the money would not be used to feed armies, or for political purposes, or other uses not intended. We were even denied the right to make inspections to see where food was needed, and where it went. With respect to UNRRA, I offered an amendment which was defeated on the floor of the Senate.

What does Mr. Clayton say about UNRRA?

The committee is, I am sure, aware of the position taken by the Department of State and the President regarding post-UNRRA relief. It has not seemed wise or proper to meet the remaining needs through an international agency. Instead it is believed that the problem which remains can best be handled directly between the individual contributing countries and the recipient countries. The Secretariat of the United Nations will be useful as a clearing point for the exchange of relevant information.

One of the major arguments advanced by the United States representatives in making clear this position regarding relief in 1947 was that the problem, although of utmost urgency and seriousness, was not of the magnitude of past years and could be handled more efficiently and expeditiously without the cumbersome mechanism of an international relief agency.

This argument is still valid. Some of the UNRRA countries no longer require free assistance; others, not as fortunate, need relatively small amounts of additional assistance to carry them through another year. Thereafter it is expected that they will be able to stand on their own feet. In addition we feel that we can more effectively adapt our program to meet changing needs and can maintain better supervision over the use of our funds and supplies by dealing directly with the countries needing assistance.

As I stated a moment ago, I saw how UNRRA worked. I think General Clark will substantiate the statement that I was one American who got into the Russian-occupied zone. I went 50 miles into the zone. I was told that I was the first American who had been there since General Clark was stationed at Vienna.

I talked with a Russian colonel, who admitted to me, first, that they were diverting food to feed the army, in direct violation of the international agreement with respect to occupied countries. Secondly, he told me that there was no inspection of UNRRA food in that country, and no investigation as to needs, or where the food went. Third, they used our food and supplies to build up a difference between a Russian worker, an Austrian worker, and those whom they actually wanted to starve to death. That is the experience with UNRRA, an international organization which was conducted by an international body. I stated then, and I say now, that we should think a long time, especially when we furnish the money which others distribute. In addition to our own direct contribution, we make an indirect contribution. We ought to have a good deal to say about the policy as to displaced persons in the next 5 years.

Do we intend to have an international board, on which Russia may be a member, define the terms with respect to persons who will not be the concern of the organization?

Once again I turn to the page cited by the distinguished Senator from West Virginia. Here are listed the exceptions, the persons who will not be the concern of the organization. I ask, What is the definition of war criminals? What is the definition of quislings? What is the definition of traitors? Who is to determine these definitions?

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield.

Mr. REVERCOMB. There is a term used which I should like to have defined, and that is the term "persons of German ethnic origin."

Mr. WHERRY. I am coming to that.

Mr. REVERCOMB. I shall be glad to hear the Senator's comments on that definition.

Mr. WHERRY. Was Mihailovich a traitor? Yet under these definitions he would not be entitled to relief.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I totally disagree, because this definition applies to those who are rebels in the postwar world against member nations of the United Nations; and Mihailovich was not in that category.

Mr. WHERRY. There are men just like Mihailovich who in the postwar period are doing the same thing. My judgment is that they would not be entitled to protection.

Who is to determine who are persons of German ethnic origin? Let me read this exception:

> Persons of German ethnic origin, whether German nationals or members of German minorities in other countries, who—
> (a) Have been or may be transferred to Germany from other countries;
>
> (b) Have been, during the Second World War, evacuated from Germany to other countries;
> (c) Have fled from, or into, Germany, or from their places of residence into countries other than Germany in order to avoid falling into the hands of Allied armies.

What would happen to the 5,600 German members of the Buchenwald concentration camp? They were German people who refused to cooperate with Hitler. Under this definition they would not be entitled to relief if they were refugees or persecuted persons in Germany.

I also visited a Lithuanian camp. Three thousand persons in that camp refused to cooperate in the puppet countries which were set up, so they were evacuated into Germany. Are they eligible for relief? They are of German origin. They speak the German language; and yet they are foreclosed by this definition.

"Persons of German ethnic origin" is the language of the definition. That means traits, customs, and language.

Reading further from the definition:

> Whether German nationals or members of German minorities in other countries—

What about Polish nationals who speak the German language, whose parents, grandparents, and great-grandparents were Germans, and who fought all the way through with the Allies? Are they to be denied this relief?

I am not sure about another thing which has just come to my attention. I refer to the last paragraph which the Senator from West Virginia read. Syria is a member of the Council, or will be a member of the Council if she qualifies. She is one of the members mentioned, and yet the Syrian Government warned 13,000 Syrian Jews that unless they publicly renounced Zionism and surrendered all Jewish refugees attempting to reach Palestine—I suppose they are probably not leaders, as the distinguished Senator has classified them—they will be sentenced to death, along with the captured refugees and any others assisting them. In other words, they must renounce Zionism in order to return to their homes.

I believe that there has been sufficient debate upon some of these provisions to show that amendments should be made to explain some of the definitions. I have an amendment which I should like to present.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield.

Mr. REVERCOMB. For the purpose of this agreement, I should like to see better definitions, so that we may know just what we are agreeing to. I ask the able Senator from Michigan to advise us what is meant by "persons of German ethnic origin." What is the meaning of the term as used in this agreement?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I have never examined the precise phrase to which the Senator refers. I know what the object is. The object is to exclude ex-enemy nationals from the jurisdiction of this organization. Ex-enemy nationals are under a totally different responsibility in Germany and Austria. They are under the responsibility, so far as subsistence is concerned, of the Army and the civilian military government. If the service of DP camps were extended to all ex-enemy Germans, the problem would be increased from 588,000 to six or seven millions. Obviously that is impossible, and I think it is not in harmony with the theory upon which this particular operation is established.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. REVERCOMB. I wonder why, in framing this language, the words "ex-enemy Germans" were not used.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think that would have been preferable.

Mr. REVERCOMB. I have looked up the word "ethnic" as found on page 877 of Webster's International Unabridged Dictionary, and there the definition is given as follows:

> 1. Pertaining to the Gentiles, or to nations not converted to Christianity; heathen; pagan—opposed to Jewish and Christian.
> 2. Relating to community of physical and mental traits in races, or designating groups of races of mankind discriminated on the basis of common customs and characters.

In using the word "ethnic" I wonder who is to determine whether the person involved is a religious man, or whether he is a Christian. It is unfortunate that in such agreements language is used which is so elastic that persons cannot be classified under it. It is impossible to determine what is meant. Why was not the term "ex-enemy Germans" used? I think it is exceedingly unfortunate that words are used here which have meanings which really cannot be defined or classified.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the distinguished Senator for his observation. I feel that these definitions should be made plain. But as I stated in my opening remarks, it is not my purpose in any way to delay enactment of this proposed legislation, because it is needed. I agree in toto with everything the distinguished Senator from Michigan has said about the emergency character of the joint resolution and that it must be enacted, because the Army is furnishing food and UNRRA is performing the administration. I agree that when UNRRA expires this Nation must be prepared to take over and feed these displaced persons. In view of the fact that world conditions have changed in the past 2 months, I was hopeful that the arguments made and the colloquy engaged in today might prove the basis for further consideration of the joint resolution and clarification of the definitions.

I shall now read into the RECORD an amendment for which I ask the consideration of the Senator from Michigan, so that if amendment is made in the House and if amendments are to be added to the constitution, there will be no delay in launching the machinery. The amendment is as follows:

> At the end of line 12, page 2, strike out the period, insert in lieu thereof a semicolon, and add the following: "Provided further, That this authority is granted and the approval of the Congress of the acceptance of membership of the United States in the International Refugee Organization is given upon condition and with the reservation that the Organization shall not discriminate for or against (a) persons otherwise eligible who refuse to return to their country of origin, the present government of which cannot guarantee personal and political liberty; (b) persons who have endeavored to reestablish the independence of their country of origin as it existed on August 23, 1939; and (c) persons solely because of their racial or religious origin or affiliation: And provided further, That as a condition precedent the Organization shall agree (a) to permit free access of the United States Government officials for the purpose of observing whether the assistance authorized is utilized effectively; (b) to permit representatives of the press and radio of the United States to observe freely and to report fully regarding the utilization of such assistance; and (c) to make such provisions as may be required by the President of the United States for the security of any article, service, or information received pursuant to this joint resolution."

Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Michigan for giving his time. I agree with the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY] that because of the tremendous responsibilities upon his shoulders it was a physical effort for the Senator from Michigan to stand here and answer a great many questions. I hope the Senator will forgive me. I believe I have suggested definitions of terms to which the Senator ought to give his further attention, and I hope when that is done it will not require as much of his physical effort as has been required in answering my questions on the floor this morning.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator by way of benediction that he owes me no apology for anything. I am grateful to him for his discussion. It has been very illuminating. We disagree in respect to some interpretations, but the Senator is always interesting and able.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DONNELL. Has the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia for himself, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. McGRATH] been accepted by the proponents of Senate Joint Resolution 77?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, I have listened with great interest to the very able exposition of the position of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, as he described his position with reference to the joint resolution. There is no argument between us on the object of the resolution which has been offered. I realize fully the plight of these unfortunate people. There are more than a half million of them today in the American zone. I realize that it is a problem for America to solve. I further realize that we have undertaken to solve the problem and have the obligation to follow it through. I subscribe to the view that other nations should join together in the administration of the work of mercy and in solving the problem which confronts us. But too often in preparing to perform a good work, when agreements are drafted containing the language which will constitute the guide for action, words are used that have no bearing and should have no part in the obligation which is being undertaken.

The amendment which has been offered to the resolution on behalf of myself and the able Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] is solely for the purpose of removing any question of doubt whatever that under the guise of authority of this resolution persons may be brought into this country without the consent of Congress which, from the beginning of our Nation, has had control of the entry of immigrants to America. I am delighted that the Senator from Michigan joins me in that. He has, however, taken a view in which I do not join, and that is that there is nothing to be found in the constitution of the International Refugee Organization which endangers or bears upon the entry of people into this country.

I believe the able Senator talked about having lawyer trouble. I say to him with all kindness and friendship that he would have had no lawyer trouble whatsoever if he had listened and followed, and if his committee had gone along with, the Judiciary Committee, which became very much concerned with this problem—particularly so because it deals with the subject of immigration into our country. I do not wish to give the Senator any more lawyer trouble, but I am compelled to disagree with the view he takes; namely, that there is nothing in the agreement or constitution bearing upon the immigration question.

I desire to point out now, first of all, that there was no doubt in the minds of the members of the Senate Judiciary Committee that this subject involved and touched very closely upon the general subject of immigration and our established immigration laws, so much so that every member of the Judiciary Committee signed a letter to its chairman, the able Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], asking him to take up this subject and see to it that the immigration laws of the United States were not transgressed by any action taken upon this joint resolution. As a result of that action, a proposed amendment, generally like the amendment now before the Senate, was submitted. That was not drawn entirely by those who have offered it; that amendment, Mr. President, is the work of counsel of the Judiciary Committee, the legislative counsel of the Senate, and counsel in the Library of Congress.

I wish to point out now, if I may, the places in the constitution of the International Refugee Organization where definite reference is made to subjects involving immigration or the entry of people into the United States, whether they be called refugees or immigrants. I read from page 2 of the International Refugee Organization resolution of the General Assembly, dated December 27, 1946, and coming from the Department of State:

> Having considered the constitution of the International Refugee Organization and the arrrangement for a preparatory commission as approved by the Economic and Social Council;
>
> Considering that every effort should be made to provide for the early establishment of the International Refugee Organization and the provision of measures during the interim period designed to facilitate such establishment;
>
> Therefore—

Now I pass over (a), (b), (c), and (d), and come to paragraph (e).

It "urges members of the United Nations to give the most favorable consideration to receiving each into its territory at the earliest possible time, so far as may be practicable for permanent resettlement, its fair share of the nonrepatriable persons who are the concern of the International Refugee Organization and this in conformity with the principles of the Organization."

Mr. President, that is an appeal to all members of the United Nations—and we are one of them—to take as many refugees as they can, as soon as they can, into their borders; and the conclusion is inescapable that the refugee problem is tied in to the immigration question and our immigration laws. So, from the standpoint of some of us, it became very important to see to it that the laws of the Congress which control immigration shall be maintained inviolate, and that we shall not, by signing this agreement and passing this joint resolution, thereby becoming a member of the Organization, surrender the power of Congress over the subject of the entry of persons into the United States. That was the question.

Let us go further into the question whether there is any link between the subject of immigration and the pending joint resolution. Under article II of the so-called proposed constitution of the International Refugee Organization, we find what its purposes are generally intended to be. I read now from paragraph (b):

> With respect to persons for whom repatriation does not take place under paragraph 1 (a) of this article to facilitating—

Paragraph 1 (a) deals with repatriation, sending the people back to their homeland, when that can be done with safety to them.

It is one of the powers and purposes——

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REVERCOMB. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. From what is the Senator reading?

Mr. REVERCOMB. I am reading from the constitution of the International Refugee Organization. I wish every Member of the Senate had a copy of it. I sent to the Department of State, and I have one of the early copies and also one of the later prints of it.

Mr. LANGER. I have one in my hand, but the numbers of the articles do not correspond at all.

Mr. REVERCOMB. I regret that very much. These were sent to me, as I have said, from the Department of State. I shall be very happy to place them in the hands of any Senator as soon as I finish using them for the purpose of my remarks.

Mr. President, continuing with what these powers are with respect to resettling people:

> (i) Their reestablishment in countries of temporary residence—

Now we are dealing with the refugees—

> (ii) The emigration to, resettlement and reestablishment in other countries of individuals or family units, and
> (iii) As may be necessary and practicable within available resources and subject to the relevant financial regulations, the investigation, promotion or execution of projects of group resettlement or large-scale resettlement.

Mr. President, that language can mean only one thing; namely, that among the purposes of this Organization there is added the purpose of resettling these persons—about a million of them, I believe, who today are in Europe—in various parts of the world.

This agreement undertakes to have the United States pay 45 percent of the cost of conducting the work of the International Refugee Organization. Is that provision significant? This country must keep within its Congress, its legislative body, the sole power to deal with immigration. If the United States places that power in the hands of this international organization, and if the United States pays 45 percent of the cost, based upon the idea of our great wealth, do we not know that 45 percent of those refugees will be brought to the United States? So, Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment, as I have said, is to see that nothing is surrendered in the way of the sovereignty of the United States over the subject of permitting persons to enter the United States.

It is interesting to note that when the first resolution came before the Foreign Relations Committee, it contained no provision whatsoever, in any language, guarding against a change in the immigration laws of the United States.

I do not doubt for a minute—and let no one think that I question—the earnestness of those who have expressed the view that this proposal has nothing to do with immigration. But I do question their conclusion, I do question their judgment, because it is written—and I have read the provision—into the Constitution that one of the first purposes of the organization is to resettle persons permanently anywhere in the world. The amendment I have offered, to use the language of the Senator from Michigan, is designed to close every window against an attack upon the sovereignty and the power of this Government to control the entrance of alien peoples into America.

Mr. President, to show that there was difference of opinion, I have before me a memorandum prepared by able counsel who have given attention to this subject, and who advised the members of the Committee on the Judiciary upon it. Without reading from it at length, at this time, I ask unanimous consent that it be made a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BALDWIN in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM RE MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—INTERNATIONAL REFUGEE ORGANIZATION (H. DOC. NO. 145)

SYNOPSIS

1. Under the provisions of the constitution of the International Refugee Organization the organization is vested with power to "conduct negotiations and conclude agreements with governments." The scope of these agreements involves resettlement of immigrants.

2. There is no power vested in Congress to conclude agreements. The President, under his general executive power and frequently under legislative enactments, is the only agency of the United States vested with power to conclude such agreements.

3. The authorities hold that the operative effect of agreements executed by the President is the same as the operative effect of a treaty, namely that such agreements prevail over contrary statutes.

4. It is suggested that the acceptance by Congress of the Constitution of the International Refugee Organization be conditioned upon the future approval by Congress of any agreement negotiated or entered into by the President. Precedent for this is found in the United Nations Participation Act of 1945.

I. CHRONOLOGY

(a) February 12, 1946, the General Assembly of the United Nations Organization referred the problem of refugees and displaced persons to the Economic and Social Council for examination and report.

(b) February 16, 1946, the Economic and Social Council established Special Committee on Refugees and Displaced Persons.

(c) June 1, 1946, Special Committee on Refugees and Displaced Persons reported to second session of Economic and Social Council. This report included a draft of a constitution for the proposed International Refugee Organization.

(d) June 21, 1946, the Economic and Social Council adopted, after revising and amending, the draft constitution.

(e) December 15, 1946, the General Assembly of the United Nations Organization, having made certain changes in the draft constitution, approved the same.

(f) December 16, 1946, Senator Warren Austin, the United States representative to the United Nations signed the constitution of the International Refugee Organization subject to subsequent approval by the Congress.

(g) February 24, 1947, President Truman recommended that the Congress authorize the United States to participate as a member of the International Refugee Organization.

II. PROVISIONS OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL REFUGEE ORGANIZATION, HEREIN UNDER SCRUTINY

Among the functions and powers vested in the International Refugee Organization, under the terms of article 2, are the following:

"(e) to conduct negotiations and conclude agreements with Governments;"

* * * * *

"(i) to undertake any project appropriate to the accomplishment of the purposes of this Organization;

"(j) to conclude agreements with countries able and willing to receive refugees and displaced persons for the purpose of insuring the protection of their legitimate rights and interests insofar as this may be necessary;

"(k) in general, to perform any other legal act appropriate to its purposes."

Section 3 of article 9 of the Constitution of the International Refugee Organization provides as follows:

"3. In the performance of their duties, the Director-General and the staff shall not seek or receive instructions from any Government or from any other authority external to the Organization. They shall refrain from any action which might reflect on their position as international officials responsible only to the Organization. Each member of the Organization undertakes to respect the exclusively international character of the responsibilities of the Director-General and the staff and not to seek to influence them in the discharge of their responsibilities."

Article 15 of the constitution of the International Refugee Organization provides as follows:

"The relationship of the Organization with the governments or administrations of countries in which displaced persons or refugees are located and the conditions under which it will operate in such countries shall be determined by agreements to be negotiated by it with such governments or administrations in accordance with the terms of this constitution."

III. PROCEDURE FOR ACCEPTANCE

Section 1 of article 18 of the constitution of the International Refugee Organization provides as follows:

"(a) States may become parties to this constitution by:

"(i) Signature without reservation as to approval;

"(ii) Signature subject to approval followed by acceptance;

"(iii) Acceptance.

"(b) Acceptance shall be effected by the deposit of a formal instrument with the Secretary-General of the United Nations."

As noted in the chronology (supra) on December 16, 1946, Senator Warren Austin, the United States representative to the United Nations, signed the constitution of the International Refugee Organization, subject to subsequent approval by the Congress.

It will be observed that the procedure for acceptance by the United States of the constitution of the International Refugee Organization does not contemplate treatment of such constitution as a treaty within the purview of the constitution of the United States. Under the provisions of section 2 of article II of the Constitution of the United States, the President "shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur." Under the provisions of article VI of the Constitution of the United States, the Constitution "and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all treaties made, or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land."

The message of the President, recommending that participation as a member of the International Refugee Organization by the United States be authorized, was addressed not to the Senate but to the Congress, and it is contemplated that authorization may be made by a simple majority of both Houses of the Congress, rather than by two-thirds of the Senators present.

IV. STATEMENT OF ISSUES

1. If Congress authorizes participation as a member of the International Refugee Organization by the United States, who will be empowered on behalf of the United States "to conduct negotiations and conclude agreements" with the International Refugee Organization?

2. Can such agreements have the effect of suspending contrary laws of the United States?

3. What steps, if any, can Congress take to insure that if Congress authorizes participation as a member of the International Refugee Organization by the United States, the laws of the United States will not thereafter be affected by "agreements" without congressional sanction?

V. CONSIDERATION OF ISSUE 1

"Governmental power over external affairs is not distributed (between the National Government and the several States) but is vested exclusively in the National Government. And in respect of what was done here (in making an executive agreement with Russia) the Executive had authority to speak as the sole organ of that Government. The assignment and the agreement in connection therewith did not, as in the case of treaties, as that term is used in the treaty making clause of the Constitution (Article II, sec. 2), require the advice and consent of the Senate" (United States v. Belmont (1937), 301 U. S. 324, 330).

"The President of the United States is intrusted with the right of conducting all negotiations with foreign governments and is the judge of the expediency of instituting, conducting, or terminating such negotiations in respect to claims against foreign governments. (Executive) agreements of such adjustment or settlement of such claims are not submitted to the Senate" (State of Russia v. National City Bank (1934), 69 F. 2d 44, 48).

"That document (the Constitution) contains, however, no definition of a treaty and no statement declaring under what circumstances a conventional arrangement purporting to bind the United States must be dealt with according to the procedure that is mandatory in the case of treaties. The reference to an 'agreement or compact' with a foreign power which no State of the Union is permitted to enter into without the consent of Congress indicates the familiarity of those who framed the Constitution with the habit of States to conclude international agreements of lesser dignity, which by reason of their form or content, as well as the methods employed in perfecting the contractual relationship, were not dealt with as treaties by the persons or countries which found it convenient to have recourse to them" (International Law (1945), Charles Cheney Hyde, vol. 2, p. 1405).

"In a memorandum by the Solicitor (Nielson) for the Department of State (1922) agreements made by the Executive and not submitted to the Senate were classified as (1) 'agreements made pursuant to authority contained in acts of Congress', and (2) 'agreements entered into purely as executive acts without legislative authorization'" (Digest of International Law (1943), Green Haywood Hackworth, vol. 5, p. 390).

Query: Would not acceptance by Congress of the constitution of the International Refugee Organization, which constitution provides for "agreements," raise the presumption that Congress is, irrespective of other "Executive power" of the President, vesting in him, as a matter of legislative enactment, the power to conclude on behalf of the United States such agreements? This query is pertinent in view of the quotation immediately preceding and also in view of the following quotations:

"In addition to the authority of the President under the Constitution to negotiate and sign treaties with foreign governments and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to ratify them, the Executive is empowered without legislative sanction to conclude with foreign governments certain classes of agreements which are not classified as treaties in the sense in which that term is used in the Constitution. There agreements are concluded by virtue of the authority inherent in the Chief Executive under the Constitution, and are confined to subject matter within the purview of his constitutional authority" (ibid.).

"Perhaps there is no exact definition possible of the expression 'Executive agreements.' It is doubtless used to include international agreements made by the Executive (whether under statutory authority or not), but excluding those made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. In this sense it is obvious that the term comprises agreements and acts of a quite varied nature; for while such an agreement may finally be made by the President or under his direction, it may in some cases have a very different basis of authority from others; it may rest on a statute; it may follow a treaty; it may be an exercise of the power of the President under the Constitution and without the aid of statute or treaty, such a modus vivendi or an agreement for the determination of claims of American citizens against another country; or it may, as in the case of an armistice, be his act as Commander in Chief" (International Executive Agreements (1941), Wallace Mitchell McClure, p. 277).

"Whatever distinction there is between treaties and executive agreements must be found, not in the practices and doctrines of international law, but in our own unique constitutional law. By common practice under that law the term 'treaty' is used to refer to every agreement, whether written or verbal, important or unimportant, with one or more foreign nations which, prior to ratification by the President, receives the consent of two-thirds of the Senate, and which is never submitted for approval to the House of Representatives. The term 'executive agreement,' on the other hand, is used both colloquially and in scholarly and governmental writings as a convenient catch-all to subsume all other international agreements intended to bind the United States and other governments. Despite many attempts to make distinctions between treaties and executive agreements in terms of form, subject matter, and legal practical consequences, and however surprising or even shocking the conclusion may be to any who have not examined the record, this common usage is the only distinction that the facts of our constitutional law and practice will sustain * * * there are no significant criteria, under the Constitution of the United States or in the diplomatic practice of this Government, by which the genus 'treaty' can be distinguished from the genus 'executive agreement,' other than the single criterion of the procedure or authority by which the United States' consent to ratification is obtained. More explicitly, agreements with other governments, when consummated pursuant to congressional authorization or when subsequently sanctioned by Congress, have the identical legal and practical consequences both under the municipal law of the United States and at international law, as treaties, consented to by two-thirds of the Senate" (Treaties and Congressional-Executive or Presidential Agreements (1945), Yale Law Journal, 54: 181, 197).

At this point it is pertinent to direct attention to an illustration of (a) executive agreement pursuant to congressional authority and (b) executive agreement entered into purely as an executive act without legislative authorization.

(a) Under the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act (June 17, 1930, 48 Stat. 943) the Congress provided that the President, "whenever he finds as a fact that any existing duties or other import restrictions of the United States or any foreign country are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States and that the purpose (in the act) declared will be promoted by the means (in the act) specified, is authorized from time to time (1) to enter into foreign-trade agreements with foreign governments or instrumentalities thereof; and (2) to proclaim such modifications of existing duties and other import restrictions, or such additional import restrictions, or such continuance, and for such minimum periods, of existing customs or excise treatment of any article covered by foreign-trade agreements, as are required or appropriate to carry out any foreign-trade agreement that the President has entered into hereunder."

(b) An illustration of an executive agreement entered into purely as an executive act without legislative authorization was the agreement of the President to transfer destroyers in exchange for the use of certain British naval and air bases. (See 39 Op. A. G. 484; Executive Agreement Series No. 181).

Conclusion on issue 1

From the foregoing authorities it is concluded that if Congress authorizes participation as a member of the International Refugee Organization by the United States, the Constitution of which provides for "agreements with governments," the Congress will by such authorization either (a) vest, as in the case of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, power in the President to conclude such agreements or (b) give sanction to an organization with which the President could, irrespective of legislative authorization, conclude such agreements.

VI. CONSIDERATION OF ISSUE 2

As was noted in the citation of the authorities referred to in V of this memorandum, the operative effect of an executive agreement is not distinguishable from that of a treaty. Although the procedure to be observed in consummation of a treaty differs from the procedure followed in consummation of an executive agreement, the legal practical consequences are the same.

Article VI (paragraph 2) of the Constitution of the United States reads:

"This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all treaties made, or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land."

It is well settled that a treaty has the effect of repealing all preceding Federal law in conflict with it, whether unwritten, as the law of nations or admiralty and common law, or written as acts of Congress (6 Op. Atty. Gen. 293). See also Whitney v. Robertson (8 S. Ct. 456, 124 U. S. 194).

In the course of his message recommending that the Congress authorize the United States to participate as a member of the International Refugee Organization the President stated:

"The Organization to be created will have no governmental powers. It can in no way alter the statutes of any of its members, such alteration could be made under the terms of the "agreements" provided for in the constitution of the Organization, which agreements, it is submitted could be made and entered into on behalf of the United States by the President.

VII. CONSIDERATION OF ISSUE 3

As will be noted by reference to III of this memorandum there is no provision for a conditional acceptance by the Congress of the constitution of the International Refugee Organization. As to whether or not a conditional acceptance would be regarded by the Organization as either (a) rejection or (b) total acceptance, no authorities are available.

It is suggested, however, that precedent exists for Congressional limitations on Executive agreements based on legislative action. Section 6 of the United Nations Participation Act of 1945 provides in part as follows:

"The President is authorized to negotiate a special agreement or agreements with the Security Council which shall be subject to the approval of the Congress by appropriate act or joint resolution, providing for the numbers and types of armed forces * * *.

"Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as an authorization to the President by the Congress to make available to the Security Council for such purpose armed forces, facilities, or assistance in addition to the forces, facilities, and assistance provided for in such special agreement or agreements."

Further authority for the Congress to limit the scope of Executive agreements, based on legislative enactment, is found in the following quotation:

"In short, we are of opinion that, so far as a treaty made by the United States with any foreign nation can become the subject of judicial cognizance in the courts of this country, it is subject to such acts as Congress may pass for its enforcement, modification, or repeal" (Head Money cases (1884), 112 U. S. 580, 599).

Suggested procedure

1. A conditional acceptance based on a proviso that the laws of the United States shall not be suspended by any such agreements and that any such agreements shall first be submitted to Congress for approval or disapproval. (Similar to Participation Act of 1945, supra.)

2. As an alternative, accompany the acceptance with legislation in which are provided standards as a basis for executive agreements. This would follow the plan of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, referred to, supra.

The foregoing is based on the assumption that the authority for the executive agreements would be derived from the acceptance by the Congress of the International Refugee Organization. If, however, an exercise of such authority is derived from the general executive power apart from act of Congress it is suggested that Congress, before it accepts the Constitution, request a statement from the President as to the policy which he will pursue in regard to agreements which may affect existing laws of the United States.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, this memorandum sets forth very clearly authority after authority, decisions of the courts one after another, which bear upon the question of whether or not the immigration laws are under the control of the Congress; and we are called upon today to determine whether control shall remain there. Also they deal with Executive agreements, something that we cannot permit to be used on this subject. I say that unless the pending joint resolution shall be amended as proposed, there will have been taken away from the Congress its power over immigration. I submit upon this brief as a legal proposition, that it is one of the greatest threats to the sovereignty of the American Government.

The Senator from Michigan said—and he stated it fairly, and I was very glad to hear it—that he wants the joint resolution, quoting his language, "so plain that nobody can misunderstand it." If he wants it so plain—and all of us join with him in that—that no one can misunderstand it, then let him accept my amendment, which cannot be misunderstood in the clear language in which it is drawn. As I said, it was drawn by able counsel.

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REVERCOMB. I yield.

Mr. DWORSHAK. The Senator from West Virginia is deserving of commendation for his solicitude in behalf of the integrity of our immigration laws. During the war many hundreds of thousands of alien refugees entered the United States in violation of our immigration laws, and little if anything was done to apprehend them. Only a few days ago there appeared an article in one of the local daily newspapers from which I quote:

> Estimates of illegal entries range from 500,000 to almost a million a year. Even half of the lowest estimate would be considerably higher than the current annual rate of 138,000 legal immigrants.
> Attorney General Clark estimated last year that illegal alien entries totaled 2,000 daily, with only half of these persons apprehended by the Government.

It is apparent that, although fighting ceased almost 2 years ago, aliens are still entering our country, and the Department of Justice faces a serious challenge in attempting to meet that situation. I am in complete accord with the Senator from West Virginia that we should demand the right for the Congress to determine whether these alien refugees should enter our country, and we should make no concessions, under the terms of the proposed legislation currently before this body, which would in any degree deprive Congress of its authority. I sincerely trust that the Senator will continue to defend the position he has taken, because in doing so he will render outstanding service to the Nation.

Mr. REVERCOMB. I deeply appreciate the remarks of the able Senator from Idaho. I am delighted to have his aid in this movement, because there is involved indeed a threat to our own country. I wish to discuss a little later, in a review of the history of immigration, some of the points which have been brought out by the able Senator from Idaho, and I appreciate the remarks he has made.

Mr. O'DANIEL. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia yield?

Mr. REVERCOMB. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. O'DANIEL. It is quite apparent to me, from reading the joint resolution and other literature relating to the proposal, that the main objective is to nullify the immigration laws of the United States, or to circumvent them in some manner. If that be true, and that is the intention of the proposed legislation, am I to understand that the Senator from West Virginia is proposing an amendment which would prevent the very thing I have suggested?

Mr. REVERCOMB. It is my earnest belief that the adoption of my amendment, which is drawn after careful consideration, after advice of counsel, will stop any construction of the joint resolution which would take from Congress complete control over immigration. If it is not adopted, then by the joint resolution Congress will surrender its control over the immigration laws.

Mr. O'DANIEL. If that be the case, why should Congress pass this joint resolution which would call for the expenditure of $75,000,000 or more a year and then add the Senator's amendment which would prevent the Organization from doing what it proposes to do? Would it not be more logical and economical and consistent merely to refuse to pass the joint resolution, and thus save the $75,000,000 or more a year?

Mr. REVERCOMB. I recognize the problem of the refugees and their maintenance, and the continuance of the duty we have to look after them somewhere, to see that they do not starve, to see that they are clothed; but I say that when we undertake that task, we can do it without surrendering the control of the Congress over the immigration laws. I wish to save control of immigration in the Congress, and that is why I have offered the amendment.

Mr. O'DANIEL. I agree with the Senator. I think that practically every American citizen has a great deal of sympathy and human understanding for the displaced persons, and each of us individually wants to do everything possible to alleviate their suffering and improve their present condition. But to do that is it necessary to do what is proposed in the pending joint resolution, which would destroy the power of Congress to control immigration into this country?

Mr. REVERCOMB. The power of Congress will not be destroyed if my amendment shall be adopted.

Mr. O'DANIEL. I mean without the Senator's amendment. It is possible the joint resolution may be passed without his amendment.

Mr. REVERCOMB. If the amendment shall not be adopted, I shall have to vote against the joint resolution, and I think other Senators entertain the same feeling. It has been indicated that the amendment may be agreed to, but unless the amendment shall be adopted, I say to the Senator from Texas that we cannot enter this organization with any certainty that control of immigration will remain in the Congress.

Mr. O'DANIEL. In other words, if the Senator's amendment shall be agreed to, it will involve this Nation spending $75,000,000 or more per annum to remain in the same position regarding our immigration laws as if we did not pass the joint resolution at all?

Mr. REVERCOMB. That is correct; yes.

Mr. O'DANIEL. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

Mr. REVERCOMB. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, answering the last point made by the distinguished Senator from Texas, he seemed to imply that we were spending $75,000,000 for some useless purpose.

Mr. REVERCOMB. I did not think he made that point. I did not so understand him.

Mr. SMITH. I got that impression. I merely want, in defense of the Senator from Michigan who presented the case originally, to say that he pointed out that we had to consider taking care of these people in our own military zone in Germany at a greater cost than would be involved if we participated in the refugee program.

I might say also while I am on my feet that the Committee on Foreign Relations, of which I have the honor to be a member, felt that the governing clause in article II, from which the distinguished Senator from West Virginia has been reading, is section 1, which, referring to resettlement and reestablishment, says:

> In countries willing and able to receive them.

We understood, of course, that that meant willing to receive them under their own laws.

We were all willing, I will say to the Senator from West Virginia, to accept any amendment that would make that absolutely clear, and without any question or equivocation, and therefore we were all perfectly willing to accept the amendment which the distinguished Senator from West Virginia has offered. As the distinguished Senator from Michigan has said, there is no debate about it. It is merely a question as to what form the amendment should take, whether the language, which seemed to us sound, as offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER], and which appears in the report of the committee, or the amendment which the Senator from West Virginia now offers. So we are now discussing which is the best way to do it, and as I say we are willing to accept the one which the Senator from West Virginia has offered.

Mr. REVERCOMB. I thank the Senator from New Jersey. I am delighted to hear his statement. I talked to the Senator from Iowa; we have had conversations about this question; and of course I am quite hopeful that my amendment will be agreed to. It was drawn after very careful study and counsel of those who considered it in order to make crystal clear the purpose to protect the immigration laws of the United States.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REVERCOMB. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. But referring to the question asked by the Senator from Texas, and the answer by the Senator from West Virginia, I do not quite agree that, unless the amendment or the substitute offered by the Senator from West Virginia is adopted, the question of immigration will be wide open. I am fully convinced that if the amendment as adopted by the committee and written into the bill is agreed to, the situation will be amply and completely safeguarded and taken care of. However, the Senator from West Virginia did not agree that the amendment adopted by the Foreign Relations Committee was ample. I think everyone was agreed that we wanted to make this an air-tight prohibition. Several of us looked over the amendment, or the substitute, as offered by the Senator from West Virginia, and I will say I think it will do the job as well as the amendment adopted by the Foreign Relations Committee. Either one of them will do the job. But I have certainly agreed to abandon any claim for support to the amendment adopted by the Foreign Relations Committee, and to support, so far as my vote is concerned, the substitute offered by the Senator from West Virginia. I merely wanted to clarify the fact that I do not agree that his amendment has any more strength, or plugs up any more holes, than the one the Foreign Relations Committee adopted, but I am perfectly willing to go along with him, perfectly willing to have his amendment adopted, and perfectly willing to do anything that we can to strengthen this prohibition.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Now we are getting closer and closer together. I am sure that I have never intended to attack the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, and I certainly would not do it now, after the speech he has just made.

Mr. HAWKES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. REVERCOMB. I yield.

Mr. HAWKES. The amendment that the Senator from West Virginia is offering to the pending joint resolution does not change the situation in reference to illegal entries into the United States which are supposed to have occurred heretofore, does it?

Mr. REVERCOMB. No. Of course, that is an administrative problem, and one I want to speak to, beginning in a few minutes. That is a question of an investigation that must be made. It must be cleared up before I think we should ever take any step toward changing the immigration law. We must have a clear understanding of it, and that will come only after a thorough investigation, when we can see and obtain the full and complete and clear picture of the immigration subject, and have definite information of the people who have entered the United States during the past few years.

Mr. HAWKES. I should like to say to the Senator from West Virginia that I am very strongly in favor of what he is attempting to do. I think it has to do with one of the most vital issues now confronting the Nation. In the interest of all who have come to this country, and of all those who have been here for years, I believe it essential that immigration should be under the definite control of Congress. The statement by the Senator from Idaho taken from a newspaper has been rumbling around the Senate since I have been a Member of it. I have heard repeatedly from the members of the Immigration Committee that during the last 5 years, contrary to the immigration laws, anywhere from 500,000 to 2,000,000 people have come into this country. It is my hope that the Senator will not stop with the amendment he is now offering, but will go ahead and plug up all the loopholes and do all of the things which may be necessary in order to keep faith with our immigration law.

Mr. REVERCOMB. I thank the able Senator from New Jersey. I want to say to him that there is no question that today should be of greater interest to the American people, for the future of the country, than through knowledge of what has happened in the last few years not only under the immigration laws but particularly outside the laws.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REVERCOMB. I am very glad to yield.

Mr. HATCH. It is not about his particular amendment, which I know he understands perfectly, and I think I do, too; but a question has been raised about which I want to ask the Senator's interpretation. For instance, it has been suggested—and if the Senator from Michigan were here he might say it is "more lawyer trouble"—that the amendment might relate to some other agreements entirely outside the particular agreements authorized by the pending joint resolution. What is the Senator's position?

Mr. REVERCOMB. Does the Senator mean to indicate there is some other agreement?

Mr. HATCH. I am not indicating anything. I merely want the Senator to explain what I know he means, that his amendment applies only to matters covered by this particular resolution.

Mr. REVERCOMB. That is the whole scope of it. I did not for a moment consider that there was any agreement anywhere dealing with the entry of people into this country until this was brought up. Is there one?

Mr. HATCH. Not that I know of.

Mr. REVERCOMB. There is none that I know of.

Mr. HATCH. But I simply want to make it clear that we are dealing with this particular matter only.

Mr. REVERCOMB. We are; but I want to say that if there is any other agreement dealing with the entry of people into this country, I want it laid before the Senate of the United States, and laid before the other House so that it may be revealed. Certainly as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, I should like to know.

Mr. HATCH. I might say to the Senator that I am quite sure there is no other agreement, and there could not be under existing laws. We are clear on that. I am merely pinning it down now that the Senator's amendment relates to this agreement only.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Let me put it this way: The amendment of the Senator from West Virginia relates to all agreements which might enable people to come into this country, and the whole scope that the Senator has understood was within this resolution.

Mr. HATCH. That is correct; there is not anything else? Now, one other question. There is perhaps a suggestion—I do not know whether it is a correct interpretation or not—in connection with the prior approval mentioned in line 4 on page 2, that that language, being general in its terms, might not even permit the admission into this country of those who are entitled to admission under present immigration laws, unless prior approval were specifically given by Congress. I know that is not the intention.

Mr. REVERCOMB. That is certainly not the intention. I want to make that statement clear that the present entries under our quotas are not to be disturbed in any manner whatever.

Mr. HATCH. And exactly what the Senator is trying to do is to prevent any change, any alterations in the present law?

Mr. REVERCOMB. In the present law of entry by quota.

Mr. HATCH. So if a person is entitled to be admitted into this country under existing law, he would not have to come to Congress to obtain prior approval.

Mr. REVERCOMB. No. That is correct.

Mr. HATCH. I think that clears up that point. I thank the Senator.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, we are dealing as a matter of fact with a situation under which persons, whether they be refugees or not, seek entry into this country. I feel that in the discussion just preceding my remarks at this moment it has been clearly pointed out that there is a relationship between the pending question and the general subject of entry and immigration into this country. The joint resolution before us has been so amended and changed from the draft originally advocated by the State Department that the control of and the entry of persons into the United States, if this amendment is adopted, would continue under the control of the Congress. Had this change not been made, it is my view that Congress would have surrendered its control over this subject and the immigration laws of the country would have been circumvented and ignored. This view which I express is sustained by counsel of the Judiciary Committee, the legislative counsel of the Senate, and counsel in the Library of Congress. Thus we seek—and I believe effectively—to keep immigration solely within the control of the elected Congress of this country.

The subject of immigration at this time is particularly important. There are thousands upon thousands of people in the torn countries of Europe who seek entrance here. It is similar to the situation that came as an aftermath of the First World War. Of course, it is more accentuated and larger in scope today.

The problem was met with wisdom at that time, insofar as laws were enacted. It is to be hoped that it may be wisely met today for the maintenance of the strength and security of America. I may add that I hope the enforcement and administration of the laws today will help carry out their purpose.

Not only is there a great clamor by those who desire to come here, but there are many in America who seek with great pressure and by every force they can use to compel the opening of the gates of this country to a greater flood of immigration.

There is a definite appeal to the feelings of our people for those unfortunate persons who as victims of the ravages of war and because of political turmoil in their own country find themselves unable to return to their homelands. There are doubtless countless thousands who could stay in Europe with security, but they have a natural desire to come to a land which does not have to rebuild its economy such as those countries which knew the destruction of war. This latter class wants aid in a way which necessitated years ago the establishment of an annual quota system to regulate entry here. But at once we are confronted with a question of whether it is best to aid them where they are, in or near their native lands, or to place upon the people of this country the inherent burdens and dangers, both economic and political, of bringing them here.

The answer must be definite laws that will maintain the security and the strength of America.

HISTORY OF IMMIGRATION

As we approach this problem it is well to review our history of legislation on this subject. For over 100 years after the adoption of the Federal Constitution we had no organized control of immigration. Mass immigraton, in fact, was actively urged; immigrants came across the Atlantic in continuous waves, packed into immigration ships like herrings. Early American passenger brokers did a thriving business at $25 a head at the European gangplanks. Ship agents took up posts in England, Ireland, and other congested zones of Europe, soliciting mass migration, selling steerage space. Come one, come all, was our philosophy. Expanding American corporations sent labor scouts abroad, "contracted" for laborers, brought them to the United States by the steerage shiploads. Immigrant banks boomed in the principal Atlantic seaports. Immigration land frauds became a major early American racket.

Our first immigration law passed on July 4, 1864, was, in fact a law not to curtail in any way but an act to encourage immigration. It provided for a Commissioner of Immigration appointed by the President, under the direction of the Department of State, and it established the first United States Immigration Office in New York City, with a superintendent and one clerk. The Congress of 1864 charged the Commissioner, Superintendent, and clerk with the duty to protect such immigrants from imposition and fraud while providing them information and expediting their travel to their destinations. The first act of Congress on this subject was to protect the immigrant from us rather than to protect us from the immigrant.

Since 1864 various Congresses have slowly passed legislation to protect this country from the immigrant. The reason for this change of policy and the need for it is apparent because the influx of people from other lands was so great that very soon an economic situation as to sustaining them arose, and thoughtful persons foresaw a country crowded and economically ruined. So restrictive legislation followed. From entries of more than a million a year when there were no restrictions, immigration has been cut down legally, or by Congress to less than 200,000 a year for permanent residence or under permanent visas. I may add that in the year 1907, 1,285,349 people came to this country. In 1914—as recently as that year—1,218,480 persons came to our shores.

With the growth of restrictions certain persons were kept out because of their physical conditions. Thus there was a bar against those with contagious diseases, prostitutes, imbeciles, cripples, and finally, in 1918, legislation was enacted excluding and expelling aliens who were members of anarchistic or similar classes preaching the overthrow of the United States Government by force.

Following the First World War there arose, as before stated, a situation similar to that which we have today and Congress met it in the interest of this country. It was the intent of Congress, 3 years after the First World War, to limit the immigration of aliens who had proved to be least assimilable. It was thought at first that quotas based on the 1910 census, 3 percent of the foreign born of each nationality resident in the United States in 1910, would build up an increasing assimilable population. Congress discovered, however, it had based the quota legislation in 1921 on the wrong census year; that between 1890 and 1910 there had been a heavy immigration from southern and eastern Europe.

In 1924, therefore, Congress revised the immigration law again and restricted the nationalities to 2 percent of the 1890 census. This legislation proved ineffectual, one loophole being that it was based on the immigrant's residence rather than his birthplace. All an alien had to do, for example, was to become a legal resident of a favored country and he could enter the United States under that nation's quota. Some of that is being practiced today, but outside the law of the land.

In the year 1924 Congress enacted the national origins provision of the Immigration Act of that year, which became effective July 1, 1929. The national-origins provision was adopted primarily as a basis for determining quotas, but, in its broader sense, it represented the will of Congress to preserve the traditions and political system of the United States by preferable admittance of those who would be, because of their own characteristics and history, more readily assimilated into our own national life, customs, and views of government.

That law became effective July 1, 1929, and is the basic immigration law under which we have lived since that date. These quotas, which now limit immigration for permanent residence to some 153,929 quota aliens each year, nonaccumulative, permit the entry here of 65,721 people from Great Britain; 25,957 German born, and 17,853 emigrants born in Ireland. Quotas for other countries of birth are Poland, 6,524; Italy, 5,802; Sweden, 3,314; Netherlands, 3,153; Russia, 2,712; Norway, 2,377; Denmark, 1,181; Switzerland, 1,707; Austria, 1,413; Belgium, 1,304; Hungary, 869; Yugoslavia, 845; Finland, 569; Portugal, 440; Lithuania, 386; Greece, 307; Rumania, 377; Spain, 252; Syria and Lebanon, 123; and 100 immigrants a year born in the other nations of the world. The quota is divided among nations under the immigration laws of today.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REVERCOMB. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Has the Senator any figures showing whether all the quotas were taken up by the various nations last year?

Mr. REVERCOMB. I shall reach that subject; but in immediate answer to the Senator's question I will say that the quotas of countries in northern and western Europe were not filled, and have not been filled for many years. Quotas from southern, eastern, and central Europe have been overcrowded for a number of years with waiting lists.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator has digressed a little. I will ask him to digress again, for this question: Has the Senator the figures showing how many aliens entered the United States in 1946?

Mr. REVERCOMB. A total of 108,721.

Mr. McKELLAR. Were there any who entered illegally, in addition to the 108,721?

Mr. REVERCOMB. I will say to the Senator that the 108,721 came in under the law. We have heard statements as to many entering illegally. It is stated that more have entered illegally than legally. Perhaps the Senator heard the statement of the able Senator from Idaho [Mr. DWORSHAK] a moment ago quoting the Attorney General of the United States, whose department is charged with the administration of the immigration and naturalization laws. One of the very purposes of the statement I am making today is to urge upon the Congress an early and complete investigation and revelation of the entire situation, particularly as to illegal entries into this country.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am very happy to know that the Senator is interested in that subject. I am very much interested in what he has to say about it. I think we ought to reduce the quotas, instead of permitting aliens to continue to come into this country at the rate of 108,721 a year.

Mr. REVERCOMB. We certainly ought to eliminate unlawful entry into this country.

Mr. McKELLAR. Absolutely.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REVERCOMB. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. In connection with unlawful entry into the United States, I am reminded that the other day I read that under the proposed cut of the budget the offices of the customs and immigration authorities would be reduced to the point where they would not have a sufficient number of men even to patrol our own borders.

Mr. REVERCOMB. I hope that nothing will interfere with sincere, honest enforcement of the immigration laws.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. REVERCOMB. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. As a member of the Appropriations Committee, I can assure the Senator from New Mexico and all other Senators that there will be sufficient funds to enforce the law against immigrants entering the United States illegally.

Mr. REVERCOMB. I am very glad to have that statement from the ranking member of the Committee on Appropriations. I have never doubted for a moment that there would be sufficient funds to carry on the Government effectively.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. REVERCOMB. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. I hope the Senator from Tennessee, as the ranking minority member of the Committee on Appropriations, will bear this thought in mind, because illegal entries into the United States along certain borders present a most serious problem. If the force is reduced so that the job cannot be done, illegal entries will be increased many times.

Mr. REVERCOMB. It is very comforting to me to know that Senators realize that this is a serious problem and one which has been serious for years. In the course of my remarks today, and before I conclude, I should like to point out some of the practices which have been uncovered, and which I trust may be ended.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. REVERCOMB. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to say to the Senator that in my humble judgment no subject of greater importance could be brought before this body or the other body of Congress than the question of enforcing our immigration laws. The information which the Senator is presenting to the country is coming at a most appropriate time. I thank the Senator for what he is doing. He is engaged in a very fine work.

Mr. REVERCOMB. I deeply appreciate the kind remarks of the able Senator.

Since 1931, it may be stated in passing, the aliens of northern and western Europe have used less than 32 percent of their permanent quota allocations, while there has been a long, crowded, waiting list for those requesting entrance into this country from central and southern Europe.

According to the United States Department of Justice, Immigration and Naturalization Service, in the years 1900 to 1946, 19,446,910 aliens have been admitted into the United States for permanent residence.

That figure is surprising and shocking to many people in this country. In 46 years, 19,446,910 have entered legally and taken up permanent residence in the United States. Of course, since 1929 the limitation upon the permanent residents has been 153,000 a year. In the year 1907, 1,285,349 aliens entered. We had no quota system at that time, and in several years more than 1,000,000 entered annually into this country.

Assimilability is not rhetorical but basic. It is the very basis of the national origins provision of the Immigration Act of 1924, which was a realistic attempt to preserve some homogeneity in our population, which is so necessary among people dwelling togther under one government and as one nation. Any other course is bound in time to lead to internal dissension and continuous strife, and perhaps to the destruction of the very basis of our form of government, which has permitted us to grow into a strong nation of people.

It may be interesting to point out the distribution of those who have come into America. Most of our foreign-born population is to be found in the northern rather than in the southern States, for it is in the northern region of our country that over 80 percent of the foreign-born immigrant stock is concentrated—more than 20 percent being jammed into the State of New York. The areas of greatest concentration are to be found in the highly industrialized States of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, and Michigan. Less than 6 percent of the total permanent immigrants are in the southern region, including the immigrants and citizens of Mexico originating in southern California, the border and Gulf States.

In addition to the annual permanent quotas for immigrants, totaling approximately 153,929 visas, there have sprung up, especially since 1933, other classifications under which aliens can come to the United States in numbers equaling and often exceeding the annual quota figures. Foreigners can come into the United States "in transit" to another country. They may also enter the United States with "temporary" visas.

Beginning with the rise of Hitler and increasing with the expansion of fascism and nazism, many thousands of aliens entered the United States each year, legally, under these classifications. Many thousands of other aliens entered the United States illegally by jumping ships on which they had purposely taken temporary jobs as seamen; by way of the Mexican border; and in small boats from Cuba. In 1939 investigations by some of the specialists of the State, War, and Navy Departments convinced the investigators that many more aliens were in the United States out of quota than under quota. They consulted Congressional committees. In 1940 Congress passed, for the first time in the history of the United States, an alien registration act. Any foreigner in the United States who failed to register and fill out the recording forms truthfully was subject to severe penalties. It is generally considered that 90 percent of the aliens registered. At my request the Attorney General has furnished me with a statement, dated December 26, 1940, showing those aliens who registered under this law classified by country of birth and sex. A total of 5,009,857 unnaturalized aliens registered under that act in 1940.

I here ask unanimous consent to insert at this place in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a statement consisting of four pages, showing the registered aliens in the United States classified by country of birth, and sex, in 1940.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. REVERCOMB. By request, I ask that the clerk read from the last exhibit or statement I have offered, the portion which shows the location, by States, of the alien residents of our country. I refer to the total number of alien residents registered in those States under the act of December 26, 1940.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read the matter referred to from the preceding table.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REVERCOMB. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. A moment ago, when we were discussing the question of illegal entry, it occurred to me that some testimony was given recently before a committee of which I and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER] were members. The Assistant Commissioner of Immigration testified before our committee, when he appeared there in regard to another matter, that on the southern border, for the first 7 months of this year, 99,000 persons have actually been apprehended. Of course, he had no knowledge of how many other persons had crossed the border and had not been apprehended. He further testified that the problem is increasing to such an extent that they expect in the coming year to apprehend nearly 200,000.

Mr. REVERCOMB. I thank the Senator for that information, which is most interesting and very helpful. I wish to say that that is another reason for having a complete investigation made of this matter, and for using in connection with it every facility of the Government, including the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. REVERCOMB. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Do the figures which have just been read show the number of registered aliens in the various States?

Mr. REVERCOMB. They were the ones who registered in 1940, under the 1940 Act, and were not citizens. They were aliens in the United States—more than 5,000,000 of them.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Does the Senator from West Virginia have any knowledge of the pretext or other method which was used by such persons to enter the United States? Were they here on visitors' visas? I should like to know what information the Senator from West Virginia has on that subject.

Mr. REVERCOMB. I do not have any information on it. I rather suspect that persons who had come into the United States illegally would not have registered. I doubt that they would have. So we do not know how many aliens were illegally in the United States, in addition to the 5,000,000 who registered. That is my own thought upon the subject.

Thus, at the beginning of the year 1941, there were more than 5,000,000 unnaturalized persons resident in this country. Of this number, 491,591 were natives of Germanized zones of Europe; 1,235,477 were natives of Russia and the Soviet satellite zones. Here is something timely which I wish now to call to the attention of the Senate, in connection with the important issue of world communism and the great question which confronts us in that connection. It is well to bear these figures in mind, for we know the German Bund was active in the United States, its leaders being German immigrants subsequent to the First World War, many of whom became naturalized citizens. Mr. President, that fact has significance, particularly with respect to the other figure I have given you.

Today there are perhaps more than twice as many in this country from Communist-dominated areas, and it cannot be doubted that much of the communism that has spread through America to the point of danger will be found coming from these immigrants who were nurtured in this philosophy.

We shall soon consider what steps we shall take with respect to Greece and Turkey. It has also been suggested that we should take steps along the same lines, to protect Korea from communism. So we hear the cry that we must protect others from communism. I say that we have a more immediate duty, one that is upon our own doorstep—namely, to protect this country from communism, a communism that doubtless is largely led by those to whom we have given haven in this country.

Within the last few days the President of the United States has found it necessary and has seen fit to issue an order to drive Communists and those with the Communist line of thought from positions in the departments of Government. The order is a good one, but it has been a long time in coming, and I earnestly wonder how effectively such an order will be administered. As to that we must wait and see the result. But can we expect the same department heads who have harbored Communist actors within their departments to now rid this Government of them? I doubt that that will ever come about, in fact, until in some instances those department heads themselves are changed. That Communists are in these departments must be recognized from the fact of the issuance of the President's order alone.

Returning to the figure of registration of 5,009,857 aliens, the Immigration Service estimates that this alien population decreased, as of July 1, 1946, to an estimated $3,050,000 aliens, as a result of naturalization, emigration from this country, and death. There was a rush for naturalization after the Registration Act became law, and 1,437,000 of the 1940 aliens had been rushed through citizenship mills between the beginning of 1941 and July 1, 1946. Just how good citizens these 1,437,000 hastily approved persons will become remains to be seen. They did not desire citizenship until they were revealed to be living here within this haven while maintaining their allegiance to their native countries. Then they rushed to become citizens.

To the alien statistics of 1940 there will now have to be added the figures for the aliens who entered the United States during the years 1941 to 1946. I have been furnished two tables of statements dealing with entries from June 30, 1939 to 1946, by Mr. Ugo Carusi, Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization, under date of March 20, 1947. I ask unanimous consent at this point to have included as a part of my remarks a table entitled "Immigrant Aliens Admitted, by Countries of Last Permanent Residence, Years Ended June 30, 1939 to 1946."

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the fact that the number shown on these statements are for lawful entries into the country, and do not consider or show those who have entered the United States illegally. A great many aliens came into the United States with "intransit" visas, being "in transit," according to their promises, for Cuba, Mexico, or some other part of the world; but they are still in the United States. This particular method of entering the United States and remaining here has required the specific connivance of foreign as well as American officials. During the war over 750,000 aliens were admitted into the United States under temporary quota transit visas, and Congress has not yet been advised as to what has become of them. During the period from 1925 to 1944, 1,280,716 immigrants gained entrance into the United States under quota visas. There were 1,143,158 who entered the United States as nonquota immigrants during the same years. It is evident, therefore, that very careful supervision over nonquota immigration is as important as such supervision over quota entry. The figures I have just read are taken from the Immigration and Naturalization Service, Monthly Review, August 1945, pages 187–189.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia yield?

Mr. REVERCOMB. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. LANGER. Of course the Senator is aware of the fact that only a few months ago it was shown on the Senate floor that these immigrants, or refugees, whatever we may call them, did not pay any income tax. It was estimated they had derived income of $800,000,000 without paying any income tax on it. Of course, the Senator is aware also that at the very time when our veterans cannot get homes, these people are living in houses which they either bought or have rented.

Mr. REVERCOMB. The able Senator from North Dakota has made a very valuable contribution to the discussion, and I am glad he has done so.

It must be remembered that in addition to the quota immigrants admitted to this country—153,929 are admitted for permanent residence—others are admitted for temporary stays. Still others are admitted under the preferential quota or nonquota admittance. Such entrance, temporary or preferred, is granted to foreign government officials, their families, attendants, and employees, and properly so; for "temporary" business visitors; for "temporary" pleasure visitors; for continuous travel through the United States in transit to another country; to carry on trade under treaties; to husbands and wives of United States citizens; to unmarried children of United States citizens; to natives of the other American republics and Canada, their wives and unmarried children; to ministers of religious denominations, their wives and unmarried children; to "students"; and to laborers under special agreements with other governments for temporary work, then to be returned. All of the foregoing are not included within the quota of 153,929 who may enter for permanent residence. It is doubtless these who enter outside the quota of 153,929 who are the ones that give us trouble and stay here without legal right to do so.

I urge that the Eightieth Congress proceed to ascertain the whole situation with respect to those who are validly here and those who live here against the laws we have set up for the protection of this country. Certainly no move should be made toward changing our immigration laws until these facts have been clearly ascertained and the true picture made known to the American people. Suffice it to say that there are among us many more from other countries than it was intended should be admitted under our laws.

This whole subject should be approached in a fair, sound, and practical way, with the welfare of this Nation and our people as the primary guiding principle in any step that is taken on the subject.

Many of those who have come from other lands have become great and useful citizens and have contributed much to the advancement of the United States. On the other hand, we are today beset with the advocates of political ideologies principally fostered by those who came here to find a haven among us. Also, we cannot ignore the economic situation that confronts America when millions of our own young men recently returned from the battle fronts are seeking to reestablish themselves in economic security in this country and to rear and maintain their families and to progress under the standards of free American people. It would be tragic to destroy their opportunities through an influx of people from other lands.

We cannot blind ourselves to true conditions if we are going to serve in truth the welfare of America, our own Nation, and if we are going to maintain a good living standard and keep secure the Government which we have sworn to uphold.

America will never turn a deaf ear to the distress of any people anywhere. Certainly she has poured forth her millions and her billions of dollars of wealth to aid the needy. But she must be practical enough to see that in this course of philanthropy she does not destroy her own people while helping others to get the best that can be obtained under the conditions we confront.

Mr. President, I wish to call to the attention of the Senate a very interesting program which has recently been embarked upon by Canada. From their pages we can take a lesson today. They live so close to us that their problems are quite the same as ours.

Canada is proceeding upon a program under which it takes in a limited number of persons for farm work. This has sound appeal to Americans, in whose country there is today a shortage of farm workers.

It is interesting to observe a breakdown of the permanent visas which our Foreign Service officials abroad issued to aliens for permanent entry into the United States under the existing annual quota. In the year 1945, as appears in the hearings of the Senate Committee on Immigration, of a total of 38,119 visas examined after the aliens had entered the United States, only 497 had been issued to farmers or agriculturists and only 225 to farm laborers, while 21,434 visas were issued to aliens whom the American officials found to have no occupation. The complete audit may be of value: 2,852 were listed as professionals; 1,451 were listed as proprietors; 2,120 were craftsmen; 497 were farmers, agriculturists; 225 were farm laborers; 3,715 were clericals, salesmen; 1,495 were domestic servants; 886 were laborers, outside of farmers; 21,434 were found to have no occupation. That was for the year 1945; year before last.

CANADIAN PLAN

In contrast to such a selection of immigrant stock for the United States, in a turbulent year of reorganization, reconversion, and other national problems, we have the far more enlightened immigration program of Canada. The Canadians would not allow 21,434 aliens with no occupations to enter Canada in 1945, or any other year. Nor would they allow refugees to enter Canada merely because they were refugees. When the Canadian Parliament was shown evidence that the prewar immigration into Canada had changed the percentages of the racial and national components of the Canadian population, it abruptly closed the door on all immigration from Europe pending a Crown study of Canada's need for further immigration.

The Canadian Parliament became convinced that the immigration of refugees had introduced liabilities rather than assets into the nation. The Finnish refugees admitted indiscriminately in the early 1920's for example, had become a turbulent element in Canada's political life.

A Canadian commission was assigned the task of surveying Canadian requirements for additional population. It found that the philosophy that Canada was a great undeveloped country capable of supporting, and advantageously using, several hundred thousand colonizing immigrants to be an economic fallacy. If it is an economic fallacy in Canada, it certainly would seem to me to be an economic fallacy in the United States. The previous maximum population growth of Canada, between 1901 and 1911, when it was opening up the rich prairie provinces on a large scale, was 180,000 a year. Compare this with those who entered the United States in excess of 1,000,000 per year for several years during the same time.

This Crown inquiry furnished the answer in 1946 for Canada toward groups who had been publicly advocating the free immigration of farmer-refugees from Europe and the Middle East.

Canada is proceeding upon a program under which it takes in a limited number of persons for farm work. This has sound appeal to many an American.

To balance off the shutting of Canada's door against refugee immigration the Canadian Government announced an experimental project. This is in process of being done. This is not ancient history, or in years past. This is what Canada is doing today. Some 200,000 members of the Polish Army which had fought valiantly with British troops against Germany and which also had fought against the Russian conquest of Poland, could not return to their homeland except as slave labor of the Soviet Government. Canada planned that if it had enough specific applications and agreements from approved Canadian farmers 4,000 of these Polish soldiers would be brought into Canada as farm workers. A commission was sent across the Atlantic to interview Polish veterans and select applicants after careful investigation.

This group of highly selective immigrants is now en route to Canadian farms and dairy establishments. The immigrants average 29 years of age, are unmarried, have had at least 8 years of farm experience similar to the work they will do in Canada, and have signed up to work for Canadian employers for a minimum of 2 years at regular local wages. Canadian farmers, on the other hand, have been required to sign contracts for at least one full year's employment of the immigrant, under Government specifications as to pay, shelter, food, and labor. The Government may change the place of employment and may reassign the immigrant to another employer for reason. For the 2-year period, the immigrant is in Canada on probation. After that he will be given citizenship, if he earns it.

Canada's 1947 immigration will be highly restricted, selected through personal investigations of trained officials who were sent abroad to open interview offices last December 1946, in Paris, Brussels, The Hague, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and Greece. The landing in Canada of immigrants of all classes and occupations is otherwise prohibited, except for, first, British subjects with means of self-support until employed; second, United States citizens with means of support; third, wives or children of legal residents, after inspection; fourth, fathers, mothers, or unmarried children of legal residents, after inspection; fifth, farmers having sufficient means of buying and operating Canadian farms; sixth, fiancees of legal residents, after inspection; seventh, selected veterans of the Allied armed forces, with honorable discharges, and eighth, orphaned children of the war, after inspection, and these children are called the perfect immigrant for assimilation.

In the sixth century St. Benedict, famed for providing an asylum for refugees of that era, laid down the immigration rules of his monastic order:

> If any pilgrim monk comes from a distant country and wishes as a guest to dwell within the monastery, and will be content with the customs which he finds in the place * * * he shall be received for as long a time as he desires. But if he hath been found gossipy and contumacious in the time of his sojourn as a guest, not only ought he not to be joined to the body of the monastery, but also it shall be said to him, honestly, that he must depart. If he does not go, let two stout monks, in the name of God, explain the matter to him.

In the rule of that famed monastery may be found the very heart of the principle that should guide the formation of any immigration plan.

It has been very difficult under the administration of our immigration laws to deport undesirables from this country. I am advised that there are many deportation cases that have been pending for years. Under Saint Benedict's formula of having two stout monks explain the matter to him if he fails to leave when he was unwanted is not within our laws but perhaps we can take a suggestion from it.

Therefore, it becomes all the more important that very complete inspection be made of all those entering this country, particularly with a view to seeing to it that not only may they be self-sustaining to avoid an economic problem but that they in truth may be expected to accept our customs and our way of government.

It was intended under our immigration laws as they are written that persons applying for entrance to this country under our quotas must first have visas or permits issued to them by our foreign representatives in the country of origin of the immigrant. It is my belief from information given me that it will be shown that this precaution and requirement has been ignored in many instances by the Immigration and Naturalization Service and that our foreign representatives have been bypassed in order that there may be brought here persons to whom they did not issue visas.

I want to point out on that situation an ingenious device which officials of our own Government helped to contrive, found in the Canadian agreement of 1935 which permitted aliens here on temporary visas to enter Canada, stay 1 day, and return to the United States and become permanent residents of this country. This agreement was made as a result of a conference held in 1935 between representatives of the Canadian Embassy, the Canadian Immigration Service, the State Department and the Immigration and Naturalization Service, which would permit the temporary entry into Canada of aliens in the United States who were proceeding to Canada for the sole purpose of applying for admission visas solely for the purpose of circumventing the act of Congress.

Under this agreement I charge that we have suffered one of the greatest executive abuses of our immigration laws in the history of this country. The only qualification, aside from the usual qualifications of health and morals, required for a person going to Canada for readmittance to the United States was that he had resided in this country for 6 months. It appears that he was never questioned as to how he got into this country. The result has been that many undesirables have been admitted for permanent residence by first getting into the country by any means, legal or illegal, living here 6 months and then being sent by our Immigration and Naturalization Service to Canada for 1 day's stay in order to be legally readmitted.

This action on the part of the Immigration and Naturalization Service defeats every purpose for which the national origins provision of 1924 was enacted. The purpose of that law was, first, to restrict immigration; and, second, to select immigrants from restricted quotas who would more easily be assimilated into the American way of living and ideas of government.

I have had explained to me by the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization that this was done after they had been here for 6 months, because they could not return to their native countries and go back and come back again; it was a matter of convenience of travel. I want to say, Mr. President, to me that does not excuse an evasion of the laws, because it was their duty to return to a point where the foreign visa should be issued by the representative of America, and into that situation I ask that the Senate make its inquiry.

I want to call attention to an order which was issued by President Truman on December 22, 1945, which put into effect a program for the admission into this country, under the framework of the existing immigration laws and regulations, of displaced persons and refugees from Europe. These included about 1,000 persons who had been brought into this country without visas and placed in Camp Oswego, N. Y., so that they could become permanent residents although they entered contrary to law, and that the quotas should be filled from displaced persons and refugees principally natives of central and eastern Europe and the Balkans.

Naturally as a result of this order giving selection to these refugees, those who had been waiting in their countries and were not classed as displaced persons or refugees were pushed aside and the quotas closed to them.

Up to March 1, 1947, a total of 9,918 of these displaced persons had been authoritatively admitted to the United States.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent at this point to place in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a statement furnished me by the Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization Service of the Department of Justice, entitled "Displaced Persons Admitted to the United States by Country of Birth, as of March 1, 1947."

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. REVERCOMB. On May 25, 1946, the President wrote to the Secretary of State, Mr. Byrnes, in which he said:

You will recall that on December 22, 1945, I issued a directive on the subject of immigration, in which I stated, among other things:

"The decision has been made, therefore to concentrate our immediate efforts in the American zones of occupation in Europe. This is not intended however entirely to exclude issuance of visas in other parts of the world.

"In our zones in Europe there are citizens of every major European country. Visas issued to displaced persons and refugees will be charged, according to law, to the countries of their origin. They will be distributed fairly among persons of all faiths, creeds, and nationality."

I have been informed that 90 percent of the nonpreference quotas are now being allocated to displaced persons in American zones of occupation in Europe, which means that many persons in other countries are denied the opportunity to emigrate to the United States, even though eligible to enter.

It is my view that the State Department should now give serious consideration to lessening the allocation to the American occupied zones, thus enabling displaced persons in other areas, as well as eligible persons residing in their native countries, to enter the United States under the nonpreference quotas.

It will be seen that the President, therefore, in May of last year lessened his former directive of permitting the taking in of other people and made the statement that 90 percent of the nonpreference quotas were given over to the refugees and advised the Secretary of State that others should be considered from that time on, but it is plain from the information furnished me by the Department of State that refugees were continued thereafter to be admitted under the quotas into this country, until they had exceeded the figure of 9,000, which I have just stated, and which appears in the table which I asked to have printed in the RECORD.

Congress has seen the necessity for prohibiting the immigration of persons having contagious diseases, idiots and lunatics, Asiatics, prostitutes, people convicted of moral turpitude, and finally anarchists believing in the overthrow of the United States Government by force. It is largely a matter of continued protection of the great growing American population that not only must we keep out these undesirables who have been classified under the headings above because harmful to this country, but such limitations must be strictly enforced.

The United States at the present time and in the foreseeable future certainly for its welfare needs very little immigration. It can continue, I believe, to assimilate those who enter here under the fixed quotas of our law if those charged with the enforcement of the law will see to it that selected immigrants are brought in. Naturally preference should be given to those who are kinsmen of the immigrants who have settled here and who have proved their right to receive citizenship.

We must recognize the liabilities that arise from importing revolutionaries and revolutionary intellectuals who, should we have reason to deport them, cannot be returned to the country of their origin.

Our primary interest must be in the welfare of the United States. This does not prevent us from aiding individuals when in need wherever they may be, but certainly we are not called upon to take in members of unassimilable persons from abroad or to take in any number who cannot wholly adopt our way of life.

The scrutiny and appraisal of all applicants for American immigration visas must be under the selective responsibility of the United States consular officers abroad and under the executive administration of the Department of State.

There should be a Board of Immigration Visa Review appointed by the President, with the approval of the Senate, and the membership of that board might well be representatives of the Departments of State, War, Navy, Justice, Labor, Agriculture, and Commerce. This board could prepare and present to Congress at regular intervals advice for the exclusion of certain persons and for the admittance of others.

Congress should require publication in the Federal Register, or in a separate volume, of the names and qualifications of all immigrants to whom United States visas are being issued abroad prior to the immigrants' departure for the United States.

The American problem in dealing with those who come here is both economic and political. Although the economic problem is perhaps the more important and controlling from a realistic point of view, the philosophies and political propaganda of certain groups must definitely be taken into consideration in these serious times.

It is true that the liberal traditions on which the United States was founded as a land of freedom and opportunity, open to all races, all religions, have permitted all peoples to enter here and that is in keeping with the traditions which we preserve.

We have obtained through immigration some of our best citizens, many of them ancestors of our best citizens of this time. They had strong characters and were urged toward America by their personal love of freedom and democracy. Naturally we also received those who came to the United States because of economic reasons—to make more money and accrue more property. The fact that our Constitution and laws protect personal property from seizure and confiscation was of importance to the money-making mind; it guaranteed the immigrant that if he made his fortune in the United States he could keep it for his children and his descendants.

This brought strong people among us. But in recent days, we have the communistically inclined mind with respect to property and its ownership, and over the last few decades there has been constant turmoil throughout the countries of Europe.

European people have historically been at each other's political and economic throats, embroiling this country, and Canada as well, in the wars of their enmities and ideologies.

There is certainly no good sense in any program that imports a great segment of European agitation into the American hemisphere. While some observers of today's world advocate the importing of these people into the United States as a device in lieu of exporting the products of our industries overseas, such a theory overlooks the fact that if we import here unassimilable agitators it would be similar to setting our own time fuse for an internal explosion among us, such as they have been accustomed to in their own countries.

It seems to me that if we are to be sound in our system of future immigrations, we must receive here those only who are free from the germs of communism that they may not bring their contagion into this country.

To accomplish this, we may well consider the plan followed this year by Canada. We must, first, organize a program where the persons, before they are granted their visas to leave, are known to be individuals of skill, character and health; second, we must know that when they arrive here, there is a place for them where they are needed; third, we must compile and organize lists of industries and work places and farms throughout the United States which will agree to provide those selected with gainful employment, good training in American ideals, and opportunities to become worthwhile citizens.

The kind of immigration we need must be obtained selectively under laws enacted by the Congress.

Such laws, if honestly administered for their real purpose, can permit under the quota systems already established in this country a reasonable entrance here of persons who can be assimilated not only into the American way of political thinking but also into those occupations where they are in fact needed and where they will have the opportunity to make progress.

The question is one that demands our early attention.

But before we turn to that we must be fully apprised of the real situation today which through the recent years of the turmoil of war has caused to be brought into this country many who have not fitted here and who are a festering source of trouble so long as they stay here. Only through selective immigration under definite quotas, and deportation of those who have proven unwilling to accept sound American ways can we hope to have a settled future and give haven to the right kind of people.

CONCLUSION

The facts which I have brought to the attention of the Senate I believe to be revealing enough to make us hesitate in moving to change our immigration laws or to consent to the bringing into this country of groups of persons who do not enter under the established quotas or law.

I urge upon the Senate the necessity for further and complete investigation into every phase of our immigration problem. Canada has done that and as a result of its investigation has closed its doors to general immigration except restricted entry of farm workers. I do not urge the complete closing of the door to immigrants, but I do urge that no change be made in the laws of the land as they are now established and, more than that, that we move now to see that those laws are complied with by our officials and that those who enter here be admitted upon a selected basis.

From such an investigation there should be revealed completely to us every phase of this problem so that we may deal with it intelligently and fairly. In approaching it we should be realistic in facing facts; we should stand squarely upon what is best for this country.

We know the threat of subversive activities; we know that communism, with its vicious purposes and its hidden boring-in tactics already has sent its Trojan horsemen into the United States. How many are here has never been authentically determined, and that would be a difficult task. In a recent article in the magazine Life it was estimated that there was a membership of 100,000. That number may seem small, but I have heard it to be the boast of Communists that for every 1 member they have 10 who subscribe to their ideals and their purposes.

In the recent hearings upon the nominations before the Atomic Energy Committee and before the Committee on Public Works it was brought out—and there is no doubt about it whatsoever—that Communists attempted to bore into the control of the Tennessee Valley Authority's operation. Those who admittedly had been members of the Communist Party told of such activities. Certainly, if they had planted themselves in this one industry, they must have planted themselves elsewhere in our country.

That they have infiltrated into positions of government is revealed by the order of the President of the United States issued only last Saturday, March 22, demanding that they be removed from all positions in the executive branches of the Government. They are present and with us, and their very existence ties in closely with the admission of persons from other lands.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REVERCOMB. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator has just stated that a number of Communists were found in the Tennessee Valley Authority. That is correct. I invite his attention to the fact that, as shown by the evidence in both cases—both the Lilienthal case and the Clapp case, one before the Senator's committee and the other before another committee—it was indubitably shown that four of those men in the TVA were outstanding Communists, namely, R. O. Neihoff, James T. Ramey, Paul W. Ager, and Herbert S. Marks. All four of them have been moved by Mr. Lilienthal from the TVA to the Atomic Energy Commission. So the Senator can see just what progress the Communists are making in the TVA and in the Atomic Energy Commission.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for the purpose of addressing a question to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, I am about to conclude, and I hope that I may not be interrupted by debate upon any of the pending nominations.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I can assure the Senator that I shall not take very much of his time. I merely wish to address one question to the Senator from Tennessee, which I think is necessary to clarify the record at this time.

Mr. REVERCOMB. I would like to yield to the Senator. I want to accommodate him; but while he may not intend to do so, he may incite extended argument. I will yield later to the Senator to put his question. I should like to proceed at this time.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, let me state to the Senator from West Virginia the reason I ask him to yield to me, and let me give him assurance before I ask him to yield. A statement was just made by the Senator from Tennessee referring to the political associations of certain men, as I understood him to say, proved in the hearings on the nominations to have been Communists. I merely wish to make a statement in that connection. I do not care to argue the question. I do not believe that the statement of the Senator from Tennessee should stand unchallenged at this point, because it might not be answered. I merely wish to make a statement.

Mr. REVERCOMB. I understand that the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Tennessee are not in agreement upon that subject as well as other subjects, but I will proceed now with my remarks.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Will the Senator yield if I promise not to take more than half a minute?

Mr. REVERCOMB. I yield.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. As I recall, the record will show that there is no acceptable evidence in the record regarding these nominations that any of the four men were Communists.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, I decline to yield further on that subject. That question was laid aside so that we might dispose of the pending joint resolution. We know from the President's order and from other evidence that such persons are present among us. Their very existence ties in closely with the admission of persons from other lands.

I enlist now the aid of the Department of Justice to give to Congress a full and complete report upon the picture of immigration. How many have entered here illegally? How many are remaining in this country unlawfully?

Under the Department of Justice is the Federal Bureau of Investigation. That the activities of Communists are known to the FBI is made fully clear in the speech of Mr. J. Edgar Hoover, its Director, last fall at the national convention of the American Legion in San Francisco.

Cannot the FBI, in the Department of Justice, be helpful in ascertaining for public knowledge the numbers of persons who, in truth, have entered this country, so that we may know how many are here illegally before we attempt to change any law dealing with the subject?

Let us proceed to do what is best for this country and for our people. Let us proceed to maintain here our own form of government and not endanger it through the admission of persons who may bring to us, and carry among us, the contagion of political disease; and let us not destroy the economic progress of our people here in a day of reconstruction.

We can maintain our own strength and at the same time be helpful—yes; even beneficent—to those in need elsewhere, but we should not take any step without first considering the effect of it upon the future well-being of this Nation.

Too many people are engaged in promoting what to them seems best for foreign people rather than what is best for us—the people and Government of the United States.

Mr. President, I desire now to submit and have made a part of my remarks on this subject a report which I prepared and which was filed with the steering committee of the Republican Members of the Senate, and ask that it be printed as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPORT TO THE SENATE REPUBLICAN STEERING COMMITTEE ON THE POSSIBLE ADMISSION OF DISPLACED PERSONS TO THE UNITED STATES

PREFACE

On November 19, 1946, I was advised by Senator TAFT, chairman of the Republican Steering Committee, that, at the committee meetings on November 12, 13, and 14, I had been chosen to prepare an advisory report to the committee on the subject, Possible Admission of Displaced Persons.

Senator TAFT's letter stated that the Steering Committee desired preparatory work done on the subject for the consideration of the new conference and the committees which it will create. The Steering Committee felt that it had no right to adopt or even recommend a program to the conference of the Eightieth Congress.

Accordingly, I have attempted herein to report only such facts as are pertinent and obtainable without making specific recommendations. I have, however, indicated the points upon which a legislative program may focus hereafter.

IMMIGRATION AND NATIONAL ORIGINS

Any program for the admission of displaced persons must necessarily encompass considerations of America's immigration history, and the existence of, and the reasons for, present policies and laws.
